Fee Fee Baptist Church is the oldest Baptist church west of the Mississippi River. Its outstanding record of charity and missionary support are unparalleled, an apt reflection of the pastor's commitment. Most importantly, however, the integrity of the church community, the closeness and family spirit of the congregation are unquestionable, and these are the greatest tribute to Dr. Jones. They are an example from which all churches and all people can learn.

Mr. Speaker, in an age where greed and hedonism make the headlines every day, we should all be greatful for men such as Dr. Jones who devote their lives to the spiritual well-being of those around them. Therefore, I ask this assemby to join me in honoring this man for this 30-year commitment to his congregation, to his faith, and to his God.

DRUGS AND WHITE AMERICA

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, the drug war is intensifying and that is good. But in fighting the war we must be careful to attack all sources of the problem. According to David Gergen in the September 18 U.S. News and World Report, some white liberals are arguing that this epidemic is merely a black problem. But as Mr. Gergen makes clear, the drug plague crosses boundaries of color, creed, income, and education. This country's drug epidemic affects all segments of society, not just the predominantely black inner-cities.

Mr. Gergen's article makes some very good points about this issue. Therefore, I would like to submit the article to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that my colleagues, especially my liberal colleagues, may glean some wisdom from Mr. Gergen's comments.

DRUGS AND WHITE AMERICA

(By David R. Gergen)

Just below the surface of the drug debate, a dangerous notion is taking hold. Some white liberals are beginning to argue that the nation's drug epidemic is essentially a black problem. Lay off whites smoking dope out in the suburbs or on campuses, they say, and concentrate the government's firepower on the devastation in America's urban ghettos.

It is easy to understand the sentiment. Especially since the introduction of crack in the mid-1980s, drugs have ripped apart the country's inner cities. Blacks now make up 12 percent of the nation's population, but according to the most recent statistics of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, they account for 50 percent of hospital patients given emergency treatment for heroin, 55 percent of those treated for cocaine, 60 percent of those treated for PCP. As homicide rates reach startling levels, television pictures show a steady stream of black assailants—and victims. One out of every 2 men sent to prison in America today is black. While President Bush has made an admirable start against drugs, the nation must commit far more of its resources and energies to the inner cities before it can end this catastrophe.

But it is reckless to assume that we can therefore forget about drugs in mostly white suburbs and schools. White America cannot go AWOL in this war. While drug use appears to be declining within the middle class, it is still estimated that 76 percent of those who use illegal drugs are white. Half of the country's students experiment with an illicit drug before they leave high school, and most of them are white. Casual use of drugs by affluent whites is also pumping most of the profits into pockets of drug lords, helping them prey upon inner cities. Poor blacks simply do not have $110 billion a year to keep the drug factories operating.

Figuring out answers for the inner cities may be difficult, but it is not hard to see what works among middle-class whites. Jail works. David Crosby of the band Crosby, Stills & Nash says that a year in the Texas pen finally cured him of addiction after six trips to the hospital had failed. Suspension from school, along with counseling, also works. William Bennett's drug-strategy report last week pointed out that since adopting such policies, public schools in Anne Arundel County, Md., have experienced an 80 percent decline in drug offenses.

There is one other weapon even more promising if only more American businesses had the guts to use it: Drug testing. The U.S. military has scored dramatic results through random urine tests, reducing drug use by 82 percent since 1981. A turning point for the Navy came after an A-6 pilot crashed on the flight deck of the carrier U.S.S. Nimitz, killing 14. Autopsies found that six members of the deck crew had marijuana in their bodies. The Navy quickly began random tests of everyone in uniform, and since then marijuana use among young enlisted men has been cut from 47 percent to 5 percent. Retired Adm. Paul J. Mulloy, who administered the program, says that its secret was not punishment—the Navy went light on discharges—but the fear of getting caught.

IBM, AT&T and 3M are among the private companies that have successfully begun testing job applicants and, where suspicions arise, some of their employes. Their programs are both sensitive and sensible about their workers. But such efforts are also the exception because fewer than half of the Fortune 500 companies have initiated testing programs, scared off by costs and labor opposition. If the nation is to be serious about stamping out drugs, business should do its part by adopting testing programs. With 117 million Americans now in the work force, testing represents one of the fastest and most effective ways to discourage drug abuse.

Other weapons can be found that also will work. The key is to ensure that the war is fought on all fronts and by all hands. It must unite us, not divide us. Some blacks suspect that whites are allowing drugs to spread through black neighborhoods as a form of genocide. Clearly, white Americans must provide all the resources necessary to help blacks regain control over their lives. But white Americans cannot blame drugs on blacks and refuse to see that they themselves have a drug problem, too.

TRIBUTE TO OFFICER GABRIEL VITALE

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride and respect that I rise today in tribute to Officer Gabriel Vitale. Officer Vitale was a courageous man who served his community with distinction as a patrolman with the New York City Police Department until his untimely death in December 1980 from a wound he sustained while on patrol one evening with his partner and good friend of many years, Officer James Smith.

Officer Vitale was assigned to the 109th Flushing Precinct of the New York City Police Department where he served for 2 years. Prior to his dedicated service in Flushing, Officer Vitale served for 6 years at the 103d Police Precinct in Jamaica, as well as the 28th Precinct in Harlem. Most importantly, he was awarded a commendation for bravery in the line of duty.

The son of Jim and Christine Vitale grew up in the close-knit community of College Point, Queens, where he attended St. Fidelis Church and Flushing High School along with his sister, Mary Ann, and his brother, Jim. Officer Vitale was also employed by the General Foods Corp. and later by Vitality Milk Farms. Prior to joining New York's Finest, Gabriel Vitale spent 2 years overseas in devoted service to his country.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to his meritorious service to his profession, wearing the uniform he loved, Officer Vitale devoted countless hours of his spare time to the youth of his community, especially the disadvantaged teenagers, whom he believed would grow up to lead successul lives if only afforded the caring attention and guidance they so desperately needed. Officer Gabriel Vitale provided that essential guidance to these youngsters.

Furthermore, Gabriel Vitale an avid sportsman, was both a baseball umpire and a basketball referee for the local Catholic Youth Youth Organization. On June 17, 1989, approximately 9 years after his death, the residents of the Bay Country-Bell Owners Cooperatives Corp. of Bayside gathered along with the Vitale family and his fellow officers to dedicate a park and children's playground in honor of Officer Gabriel Vitale to the children of his community whom he gave so much and received so much in return.

As well as having the strengths of his career, and the admiration of his fellow officers, Gabriel Vitale is survived by a loving family; namely, his parents, Jim and Christine Vitale; his sister, Mary Ann Meyer; his brother, James, Jr., his sister-in-law, Gertrude; and his four lovely children Ninette, Cynthia, Gabriel, Jr., and Mark. The Vitale family anxiously awaits the birth of their first grandchild, due to arrive around the holidays this coming December.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to honor the memory of Officer Gabriel Vitale, a truly heroic man who dedicated his entire life to helping others, and whose selfless devotion and support of the youth of the Queens community shall never be forgotten.

TRIBUTE TO MISS DOROTHY L. DORMAN

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to offer my heartiest congratulations to Miss Dorothy L. Dorman, principal of Padonia Elementary School in my district, upon being selected as a 1989-1990 National Distinguished Principal from Maryland by the Maryland Association of Elementary School Administrators [MAESA].

The award is part of an annual, nationwide effort to promote educational excellence in elementary and middle schools as well as to bring attention to the fundamental importance of the school principal. Dorothy was chosen for this distinguished prize by a committee of peers from across the State who recognized her outstanding dedication and her 25 years of service to the education profession.

Indeed—with qualifications such as hers—it's difficult to imagine anyone who deserved this award more than she did.

A graduate of Goucher College and the teachers college of Columbia University, Dorothy has remained a staunch advocate of public education throughout her years of service. During her 8 years as a principal—first at Middleborough Elementary School and now at Padonia, where she has been for 2 years—her creativity and innovative leadership drew praise from children, parents, fellow administrators, and teachers alike.

The qualities that has truly made her a great educator, however, has been her intense love of children, her warmth, and her keen sense of humor. She prides herself on her ability to reach out to her young people—whether it be through developing a self-worth through praise program or by offering lessons to non-English speaking students.

Indeed qualities such as these cannot be simply learned from a book but must come from a feeling which rests in one's heart. Dorothy Dorman has this feeling—and for that the children of her elementary school have been truly blessed.

Mr. Speaker, on October 17, 1989, Dorothy will journey to Washington to join other distinguished principals from 49 States at a ceremony sponsored by the National Association of Elementary School Administrators. The following day she will be duly honored at an awards banquet to be held at the J.W. Marriott Hotel.

I urge you—as well as all my colleagues—to join me in extending to Dorothy Dorman as well as the other distinguished principals from across the country my best wishes and kudos for a job well done. In terms of our Nation's educators, certainly they are the cream of the crop.

And—to Dorothy Dorman—I extend my best wishes and congratulations for a job well done.

DALAI LAMA'S PRIZE

HON. CHUCK DOUGLAS

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I first met the Dalai Lama of Tibet 10 years ago and knew him then as a man of peace. My town's newspaper has well outlined the reasons this very special person has just been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize and I offer it into the RECORD verbatim. It is time the President met with His Holiness and I urge him to do so.

[From the Concord Monitor, Oct. 6, 1989]

DALAI LAMA'S PRIZE

On grounds of saintly patience alone, Tibet's Dalai Lama deserves the Nobel Peace Prize he was awarded yesterday. For three decades, Tenzin Gyatso, the 14th Dalai Lama, has lived in exile and counseled his people in non-violence while the Chinese government carried out a deliberate program of cultural genocide in Tibet.

The Tibetans have considered themselves a sovereign nation since their founding in 127 B.C. For ages, protected by the tallest mountains in the world, they lived in a peaceful Buddhist theocracy presided over by successive god-kings, or Dalai Lamas.

China invaded Tibet in 1950 and drove the Dalai Lama into exile in 1959. He was 14 years old. There followed a program of peace through brutal repression that has led to rioting and a demand for independence. In riots last spring, Chinese troops killed 60 Tibetans.

Since the Chinese invasion, 1.2 million Tibetans have been killed by fighting or by calculated starvation. While killing Tibetans, the Chinese government embarked on a program to populate the vast Tibetan plateau with Chinese. Settlers were offered subsidized housing, triple pay and outright grants of cash. Today, Chinese outnumber Tibetans in their homeland 7.5 million to 6 million.

Tibetans are denied health care, and their life expectancy has sunk to 20 years below that of the Chinese settlers. China has reportedly used Tibet as a nuclear-waste dumping site, and Chinese troops have destroyed more than 6,000 temples during their occupation. A few have been rebuilt as tourist attractions to lure foreign cash, but the Tibetan culture, one based on scholar-monks, has nearly been destroyed.

The Dalai Lama seeks independence for Tibet in areas other than foreign policy, which would remain in Chinese hands. Tibetans want democracy. China has made feeble attempts to meet with the Dalai Lama and placate Tibetans. But, though Tibet is a hypersensitive subject with Chinese diplomats, China has felt little world pressure considering the horrors it has perpetrated.

The Nobel Committee certainly intended to send the Chinese a message by awarding the Dalai Lama the world's most respected award. We hope that message is received in Washington as well.

Despite repeated congressional entreaties, including one sponsored by Rep. Chuck Douglas, the Bush administration, like those before it, has done virtually nothing to aid Tibetans for fear of angering China and risking a long closure of its potentially vast market to American business.

So far, President Bush has refused to meet officially with the Dalai Lama. The Dalai Lama's award should give the president the excuse and the courage to welcome Tibet's leader to the White House.

REPRESENTATIVE MILLER SALUTES DVC'S 40TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, Diablo Valley College in Pleasant Hill, CA, will celebrate 40 years of service to our community on October 20, and I know that all Members of the House of Representatives will want to join me in extending congratulations to this innovative and highly respected institution of higher learning.

As a DVC alumnus myself, I deeply appreciate the opportunity that this college has provided many thousands of students to further their education and their careers.

DVC is an important component of California's pioneering higher education system—an innovation that brings quality resources right to the community. Because of DVC, thousands of men and women have been able to acquire further education, return to the classroom for training that will accelerate their careers, and nourish their intellectual curiosity.

Now, more than ever before in our Nation's history, the availability of high quality, affordable education is an essential component of our economic growth and international competitiveness in the world marketplace.

As a member of the House Education and Labor Committee, I have set as a personal goal the policy that every American should have the opportunity to attend an institution of higher education, not just following high school, but throughout their lives. DVC offers that opportunity today to tens of thousands of Contra Costans, and it serves as a model for continuing, community education.

I join our community in congratulating the admininstration, the faculty, and the student body—past and present—of DVC for 40 years of contributions to our community and our Nation. I am proud of my long relationship with the college, and proud to represent DVC in the Congress of the United States.

TRIBUTE TO SISTER MARY RITA CULLISON, C.S.J.

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a very special woman, Sister Mary Rita Cullison, who is celebrating her 50th anniversary as a nun. She has devoted her entire life to helping others and I am happy to join in her celebration.

Sister Mary Rita was born in my home county of St. Marys, and attended St. Michael's Elementary School and High School. This instilled in her a lifelong love of learning and teaching. She has pursued both as a student of music and education at Nazareth College, where she has attained a master's degree in music education. She has studied and taught at Immaculata College and served for 4 years as superior and principal at Our Lady of Sorrows School in Hartford, CT.

Sister Mary Rita returned to St. Marys County in 1971 to care for her ailing parents and to continue her work in education. She has taught and served as principal at St. Michael's School. Her presence and leadership has helped the school reach an all-time record enrollment of 297 in 1973.

She is an ever active woman, Mr. Speaker, walking a mile every day, rain or shine, and her efforts on behalf of St. Michael's School and its students will long be remembered. Her work has served the people of southern Maryland very well. In 1987, her long fight to get national accreditation for St. Michael's School brought that school the recognition and accreditation it deserves.

I offer my warmest congratulations to Sister Mary Rita Cullison, Mr. Speaker, and wish her the very best on this important anniversary.

THE UNITED STATES MUST RATIFY THE U.N. CONVENTION ON DRUGS (H. RES. 263)

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, the United States has joined with a number of other countries in negotiating an international treaty, entitled the Convention against Illicit traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic substances, which was signed in Vienna, Austria, on December 20, 1988. However, the Senate has yet to ratify the treaty. Thus, today I am introducing a House resolution (H. Res. 263) calling on the other body to expeditiously give its advice and consent to the U.N. Convention and calling on the President to ratify the Convention as soon as possible after the Senate has given its advice and consent.

The treaty is designed to establish legal means to combat all aspects of illicit drug traffic and to strengthen international cooperation in suppressing the international criminal activities of illicit traffic.

Drug trafficking by its very nature is a critical international problem in need of an international solution. This treaty is an important step in our effort to bring the entire international community into the war against drugs. I believe it deserves the full and strong support of the Congress.

Accordingly, I invite my colleagues' support for this measure and I request that the full text of this legislation (H. Res. 263) be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

H. RES. 263

Whereas illicit drug production and trafficking, drug abuse, and drug-related crime and violence have brought misery and despair to millions of people all over the world;

Whereas illegal drugs are wreaking havoc on American society, are threatening democracy and stability in Colombia, Peru, and Bolivia, as well as elsewhere in the Western Hemisphere, and are increasingly impacting on countries in Europe, Asia, and other regions of the world;

Whereas the manufacture, trafficking, and use of illegal drugs endangers the economic, social, and political foundations of all countries;

Whereas criminal organizations engaged in illegal drug trafficking generate huge financial profits, enabling them to endanger the peace and security of all countries;

Whereas illegal drug trafficking is an international criminal activity which demands a comprehensive, cooperative, and coordinated international response;

Whereas international and regional organizations; such as the United Nations, Organization of the American States, the Andean Parliament, the European Community, and other similar institutions are appropriate mechanisms to address the international problem of narcotics trafficking; and

Whereas the United States has joined with other countries in negotiating an international treaty, entitled the Convention on Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances (signed in Vienna, Austria, on December 20, 1988), which is designed to establish legal means to combat all aspects of the illicit drug traffic and to strengthen international cooperation in suppressing the international criminal activities of illicit drug traffickers; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that—

(1) the Senate should expeditiously give its advice and consent to ratification of the United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances; and

(2) the President should ratify that convention as soon as possible after the Senate gives its advice and consent.

FIGHTING THE WAR ON DRUGS

HON. JAMES McCLURE CLARKE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to share an article prepared by two of my constituents, Andee and Gil Atkisson, who operate the Peter Vitalie and Sterling Billiard Co. in Rosman, NC. They have a very interesting and original approach to helping fight the war on drugs. I commend this article to my colleagues.

FIGHTING THE WAR ON DRUGS

Nestled in among the Blue Ridge Mountains in southwestern North Carolina rests the tiny hamlet of Rosman. In recent writings this quaint community has been referred to as "A State of Mind". Rosman has a total population of 515 and this count is taken during family reunion weekend, but most important, the Peter Vitalie and Sterling Billiard manufacturing companies are located here. The Vitalie and Sterling companies are snuggled in between the beautiful frazier fur Christmas trees and the rambling French Broad river, with its fantastic waterfalls.

Andee and Gil Atkisson, owners of the two famous billiard companies, moved their facilities from Anaheim, California last year because they recognized that 75% of their market was east of the Mississippi and they had researched the labor force and the ideal climate. They accepted a tremendous challenge and have employed seventy-one local mountain-born natives. The Atkissons personally trained these youngsters, who have an average age of twenty-four years and as a result have finished craftsmen, as exhibited in the Vitalie and Sterling pool tables. These young craftsmen refer to these companies as theirs and have developed a close-knit mountain family. The Atkissons claim that their employees are the best, and most loyal and dedicated workers in the world.

The above support has provided the time and opportunity for Andee and Gil Atkisson to accept two giant tasks. The first is to have the game of pocket billiards included in the International Olympics as a competitive sport. Andee, who also hand carves tables that are valued at $100,000, claims that billiards should have been one of the original sports in the Olympics, as history dates it back to the year 1164. Andee loves to quote from Dr. William Hendrick's "History of Billiards", the facts that in 1586, Mary, Queen of Scots, was deprived of her table at Fotheringay Castle and was later wrapped in the tablecloth for her burial. She also tells of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette playing billiards on the eve of their imprisonment in 1792.

They realize that they have a monumental task ahead for the Olympics. The present goal is to gather enough world-wide support to have pocket billiards as an "exhibition" sport at Barcelona, Spain in 1992. In laying the groundwork for this mission the Atkissons first sought the advice of Howard Miller who served as Treasurer of the United States Olympic Committee for the past four years. Miller's advice was to form an international organization in order to generate the support and momentum to gain world-wide support for the Olympics. The General Counsel for the U.S. Olympic Committee has also provided ideas and support to this movement and Gil Atkisson who serves on the Board of Directors of the Billiard Congress is seeking the backing of this prestigous group. Nick Varner who is the World Champion states, "Men and women will have a long deserved opportunity to participate in the Olympics in a sport that is ranked second in active competition world-wide". With the possibility that either Atlanta or Toronto will be the home for the 1996 Olympic Games the billiard industry will continue on its unprecedented roll.

While researching the Olympic concept the Atkissons were studying the overwhelming involvement by the "Yuppie" Business Group who are demanding posh billiard parlors. They have discovered that it is great to take a date or go single to an upswing billiard parlor where there were no drugs. Findings indicate that up to ninety-percent of the pool tables being sold are going into private homes where parents are keeping their families close knit, provide a great neighborhood gathering place and they are keeping the kids off the streets and away from the drug scene. College advisors and psychologists have discovered that it is much more effective to counsel over a game of pool, than by sitting in an office.

Provided with this knowledge, the Atkissons are working with Dr. William Hendricks, Nick Varner, (who was also intercollegiate billiard champion while at Purdue), and other leaders to organize community, high school and college competitive teams. Hendricks presently offers a course in billiards at Southern Illinois University. Atkisson states that he is finding that the greatest number of guys and gals playing pool are not the cheerleaders or other varsity athletes. This competition will open a new outlet to a different group of students. Gil Atkisson goes on to state that "this is the greatest medicine and therapy available without a doctor's prescription".

Pocket billiards can be the greatest defense against drugs in the world.

The Peter Vitalie and Sterling Companies are of high hopes that other private industries and businesses will pick up on their lead and develop their own anti-drug programs. Andee Atkisson, with great enthusiasm indicated that for groups buying five tables, the company will provide one free. This is our commitment to the drug war.

The Atkissons are convinced that the little company can make a big difference in America. Their attitude and actions reek with determination and confidence. They feel that they as David can conquer Goliath in this Herculean task.

DOMESTIC VIOLENCE AFFECTS THE ELDERLY TOO

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, October 1989 has been designated "National Domestic Violence Awareness Month", and I would like to commend my friend and colleague, Representative LOUISE SLAUGHTER of New York for writing this important resolution which was signed by the President on October 6.

According to the National Center for Domestic Violence, three to four million women suffer from various forms of domestic violence each year. However, it is also important to note that over one million older Americans are physically, emotionally or financially abused by their own relatives each year.

As the Chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging's Subcommittee on Human Services, I held a hearing this summer to assess our Nation's response to the tragic problem of elder abuse. Elder abuse, an especially cruel form of domestic violence, is not a new problem in our society, but widespread public concern with the issue is a fairly recent phenomenon. According to a Congressional study, one of every 25 Americans over the age of 65 suffers moderate to severe abuse. This reflects an increase of 100,000 cases a year in less than 10 years. A typical victim of elder abuse is female, 75, frail, and living in the home of a relative. Because many elders suffer at the hands of their own family members and are afraid to report it, and because there is no universal reporting system, this figure may not accurately reflect the total number of abused seniors.

The Subcommittee hearing was held on the tenth anniversary of the first National Conference on Abuse of Older Persons held in Boston, MA. At that conference, the problem of elder abuse was for the first time identified as a national tragedy. Prior to that time, it was a hidden problem. Since that conference, a Federal response has emerged, but it has been inadequate. Over the past 10 years, the Federal role in the prevention of elder abuse has been evolving, but it has been greatly slowed by the lack of public attention, the lack of funds due to cutbacks in major programs and the failure of appropriate funds for new programs, the lack of a clear understanding of the nature of the problem, and finally, the lack of pressure from State and local governments.

So much needs to be done if we are to match to the commitment that our Nation has given to the victims of child abuse and spousal abuse. If we do not act quickly and responsibly, the number of seniors who will be abused will grow rapidly.

Currently there are only three pieces of legislation in place which recognize elder abuse as a problem and attempt to deal with it. They are title XX of the Social Security Act—Block Grants to States for Social Services, the Child Abuse Prevention Act Amendments, and the Older Americans Act.

As the Chairman of the Subcommittee that has oversight responsibility over the Older Americans Act, I am proud that under the leadership of the late Claude Pepper, a provision was added to the Older Americans Act authorizing $5 million in fiscal year 1988 and such sums as may be necessary through fiscal year 1991 for elder abuse prevention activities. More attention will be focused on this provision in the upcoming 1991 reauthorization of the Older Americans Act.

In my home State of New York, the Department of Social Services and the New York State Office on Aging have been working together to coordinate the development of policy regarding protective services for elderly adults. In 1988, over 30 percent of all protective service cases involved abuse of the elderly in some form.

We might characterize these past 10 years as the development of the Federal response. In this second decade, we must work together to strengthen resources necessary to deal with this national problem. States are beginning to take the lead in identifying the problem, and we must work more closely with the States and with local governments in handling the growing problem.

While it is important to acknowledge that domestic violence is a grave problem in our country, it is also important that we recognize that our Nation's seniors are being victimized and take the proper steps to prevent it.

IN MEMORY OF JOHN M. KINNAIRD

HON. BUD SHUSTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, when I was first elected to the House as a member of the 93rd Congress, and subsequently assigned to the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, one of the first transportation trade association representatives I became acquainted with was a man named John Kinnaird. John was with the American Trucking Associations as vice president, Government relations.

In the course of conducting my responsibilities as a committee member and attempting to achieve "90-day wonder" status by helping to bring a highway bill to the House floor in the early weeks of the first session, I came to know a few people I could count upon to give me straight answers and valid information on behalf of their respective industries. John Kinnaird was one of this group. On a scale of 1 to 10, John was an 11 for honesty, reliability, and integrity. In subsequent Congresses, until John's retirement in 1981, I benefited from his friendship and his knowledge of the motor carrier industry he so ably represented.

Mr. Speaker, the news of John Kinnaird's death on September 5 came as a shock to me and my many present and former colleagues who remember him. An article about John in Transport Topics is a worthy tribute to this fine man, and I would like to submit it for the RECORD.

[From Transport Topics, Sept. 11, 1989]

JOHN KINNAIRD DIES; FORMER LEGISLATIVE CHIEF AT ATA

John Morrow Kinnaird, a transportation attorney and former vice president of government relations at American Trucking Associations, died of cancer Sept. 5 at his home in Pawley's Island, S.C. He was 68.

Mr. Kinnaird joined ATA in 1967 as a special counsel to assist in liaison with Congress and federal agencies. He became assistant chief counsel for public affairs in 1969, and was named a vice president when the government affairs division was established in 1971. He headed the division until he retired in 1981.

Before his service with ATA, Mr. Kinnaird had distinguished himself as a motor carrier attorney, both in private practice and with Consolidated Freightways, and as a public official in his native Kentucky.

"John Kinnaird was a multi-talented lawyer and politician who headed the ATA Capitol Hill staff with skill and dignity," said former ATA president William A. Bresnahan, who hired Mr. Kinnaird. "He deserves much of the credit for the industry's many legislative successes. He earned the respect of members of Congress and gave lobbying a good name."

Mr. Bresnahan added that one of Mr. Kinnaird's "lesser known skills was as a dancer. He could do the Charleston with the best of them."

Bennett C. Whitlock Jr., another former ATA president, who succeeded Mr. Bresnahan, praised Mr. Kinnard as "one of the most respected industry representatives on Capitol Hill."

"The trucking industry was fortunate to have him head ATA's government relations division during the critical battle on deregulation. His keen political instincts were immensely valuable," Mr. Whitlock said.

J. Robert Halladay, ATA senior vice president of federation relations and a colleague of Mr. Kinnaird's for many years, added: "John was truly a class guy—a gentleman in every respect who was also a savvy, gutsy political infighter when circumstances required. He greatly increased ATA's stature and effectiveness on Capitol Hill."

Mr. Kinnaird was born in Lancaster, Ky., and attended public schools in Lexington. He interrupted his studies at the University of Kentucky in 1942 to join the U.S. Army. He became an aviation cadet, received a commission and wings in 1943, and later served as a fighter pilot in the China-Burma-India theater during World War II.

After earning a law degree from the university in 1948, he was in private practice in Nicholasville, Ky., until 1956. During this period he also served in several positions in state government: assistant attorney general, counsel to the Kentucky State Police, assistant commissioner of motor transportation and commissioner of motor transportation.

From 1956 to 1961 he held various positions with Consolidated Freightways in Menlo Park, Calif, starting as assistant general counsel and serving as a vice president for three years.

He moved to the Washington, D.C., area in 1961 and was associated with two law firms—Galland, Kharasch, Calkins & Lippman and Rea, Cross, Knebel and Kinnaird—before he joined ATA. He also served as executive secretary of the Committee on Transportation Practices, a coalition of trucking organizations formed to stamp out illegal transportation, for five years.

He is survived by his wife Sarah; daughters Jula Kinnaird, Patsy Hardin and Anne Ringham; and three grandchildren.

TRIBUTE TO SAMUEL M. CANNON, JR.

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my heartfelt sorrow at the passing of one of the true pioneers of radio broadcasting on Maryland's Eastern Shore, a dedicated community leader, and a friend of many years, Samuel M. Cannon, Jr. Sam Cannon died suddenly on Friday, September 8, 1989. I express my deepest sympathies to his mother, Grace, and wife Ellen, his two daughters, Melody Fletcher and Taffie Stephens, his grandchildren, and his many, many, friends in Cambridge and throughout the Eastern Shore.

Sam Cannon was a U.S. Navy veteran of World War II. He begin his career at radio station WCMD, now known at WCEM, in Cambridge, in 1949, and had remained there in a variety of roles for these past 40 years. Colleagues and listeners will always fondly remember Sam for his "Sunday Morning Get-'Em Up Gospel Show," as the voice of Santa Claus reading children's letters at Christmas, and for the characters of Grandpap and Matilda which he so vividly portrayed.

Sam Cannon's radio personalities served as true inspiration to many of his followers. But it was in his commitment to his community that Sam will be sorely missed. Truly a leader among leaders, Sam was a past president of the Dorchester Chamber of Commerce, president of the Cambridge Rotary Club, a member of the Board of Directors of the Dorchester General Hospital, and a member of the American Power Boat Association. Sam Cannon will always be remembered as the voice of the Cambridge Power Boat Regatta.

I will forever treasure the occasions that I had the pleasure of being in Sam's company. He always had a smile and kind words of encouragement for me. I believe that one of my district's outstanding newspapers, the "Daily Banner," described Sam best when the paper quoted WCEM General Manager Blake Wise, "Sam's all right. It's those that are left behind that are experiencing a loss. There's no way to replace him. There's only one Sam Cannon."

INTRODUCTION OF THE INCARCERATED VETERANS REHABILITATION AND READJUSTMENT ACT OF 1989

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, together with several of my colleagues, I introduced today the Incarcerated Veterans Rehabilitation and Readjustment Act of 1989. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation and further promote our Government's efforts to reach out and help all those Vietnam veterans who continue to suffer, either physically or emotionally, as a result of their military service in Vietnam.

Over the past decade our country has come a long way in helping Vietnam veterans recover from the effects of their service in Southeast Asia. Parades have been held in their honor, movies, and books have vividly portrayed the stark reality of the war, and the Vietnam Veterans Memorial has honored those who perished in the war. Most importantly, the Readjustment Counseling Service has successfully reached out to many Vietnam veterans who continue to suffer emotionally from their wartime experiences. The nearly 200 vet centers now operating throughout the country are the most concrete manifestation of our commitment to addressing the service-connected readjustment problems of Vietnam veterans.

Incarcerated veterans, however, have been largely ignored by efforts to reach out to Vietnam veterans. Outreach from vet centers into penal institutions has been the exception rather than the rule, despite the fact that over 20 percent of inmates incarcerated in State penal institutions and 17 percent of those in Federal institutions are veterans. These veterans are entitled to, and in need of, veterans benefits and services. Indeed, if recent studies are any indication, it is safe to assume that over one-quarter of incarcerated Vietnam veterans suffer from total or partial Post Traumatic Stress Disorder [PTSD], the most common and serious psychological disability afflicting Vietnam veterans.

The vet center program is uniquely qualified to reach out to incarcerated Vietnam veterans. Vet center personnel are our Nation's foremost experts in diagnosing and treating PTSD and other readjustment problems affecting Vietnam veterans. These centers have the resources to address the service-connected readjustment needs of incarcerated Vietnam veterans. What is needed, however, is legislation which will ensure that these resources are used to meet this need.

The Incarcerated Veterans Rehabilitation and Readjustment Act provides a comprehensive and cost-effective program through which the existing resources of the Readjustment Counseling Program can be used to reach out to incarcerated Vietnam veterans. The bill has three primary goals: identifying veterans upon their entry into the criminal justice system; providing the veteran with treatment for service-connected disabilities while incarcerated; and ensuring that, when necessary, such treatment is continued following incarceration to promote the veteran's adjustment to civilian society. Additional provisions require the Department of Veterans Affairs [DVA] to develop a training curriculum for use by prison personnel, and other interested professionals, in diagnosing and treating PTSD, and authorize the U.S. Parole Commission to include vet center counseling in the parole programs for incarcerated veterans. Finally, the bill requires the DVA to develop a program to extend the bill's provision to state and local penal institutions, where the majority of incarcerated veterans reside.

The focus of this bill is on the veteran, not the criminal. The bill does not excuse veterans for their crimes, nor does it have any impact on their sentence or eligibility for parole. The bill recognizes, however, that although they may be incarcerated, a veteran should not be denied treatment for service-connected problems. Doing so runs contrary to our legal and moral commitment to veterans and to our belief in the rehabilitation of criminal offenders. Indeed, it makes little sense to incarcerate and eventually release a veteran without making an effort to address a factor which may have contributed to criminal behavior. It would be a shame, moreover, if we fail to realize the vet center program's potential for playing a leading role in this effort.

There are those who will question the propriety of assisting incarcerated veterans at a time when other veterans programs are suffering due to budget constraints. This is a valid concern, and I am in no way advocating cuts in existing veterans programs to fund this legislation. I do believe, however, that with minimal outlays, the vet center program, in cooperation with groups such as the Vietnam Veterans of America [VVA], can provide important assistance to incarcerated veterans. With 33 incarcerated chapters comprising over 3,000 members, the VVA is at the forefront of efforts to help incarcerated Vietnam veterans come to grips with their wartime experiences. It's time for the DVA to do its part.

In its recent news release announcing the creation of new clinical teams to treat PTSD, the DVA stated that the teams would be located in areas with significant underserved veteran populations. I hope my colleagues, and the DVA, will recognize that incarcerated veterans are an underserved veterans population deserving of our attention. The Incarcerated Veterans Rehabilitation and Readjustment Act provides a sensible program for meeting this goal, and I urge my colleagues to support it. For the record I have attached a summary of the bill's major provisions.

OUTLINE OF THE BILL

TITLE I—INCARCERATED VETERAN ASSESSMENT AND ASSISTANCE

Requires the Federal Bureau of Prisons to identify veterans in federal prisons and inform them of their rights with regard to veterans benefits, including the availability of counseling services within the penal institution.

TITLE II—INCARCERATED VETERAN REHABILITATION COUNSELING

Requires the DVA to provide readjustment counseling to incarcerated veterans suffering from service-connected mental and psychological disorders. Requires that incarcerated veterans be provided with medical examinations, within the prison, necessary to determine their eligibility for service-connected disability compensation, and to ensure that interested veterans can be placed on the DVA's Agent Orange registry. Requires the DVA to designate a liaison between each federal prison and the nearest "vet center" and DVA regional office to coordinate veterans' services and benefits.

TITLE III—READJUSTMENT COUNSELING EDUCATION

Requires the DVA to develop a training curriculum for use in assisting FBP medical and psychiatric professionals, and other interested parties, in acquiring the expertise necessary to diagnose and treat service-connected psychiatric disabilities.

TITLE IV—POST-INCARCERATION READJUSTMENT SERVICES

Requires the DVA to inform an incarcerated veteran of his rights and responsibilities with regard to veterans benefits and services upon release from prison, including readjustment counseling from the nearest "vet center." Permits the U.S. Parole Commission to require veterans to take advantage of the services offered by the DVA "vet center" program as a condition of parole.

TITLE V—STATE AND LOCAL OUTREACH ASSISTANCE

Requires the DVA to develop a program to extend the provisions of the bill to veterans incarcerated in state and local penal institutions. This provision is particularly important since the majority of incarcerated veterans reside in state and local penal institutions.

TITLE VI—ANNUAL REPORTS

Requires the DVA, FBP, Department of Labor, and the U.S. Parole Commission to submit to Congress an annual report relating to their activities in implementing the bill.

HONORING THE 60TH ANNIVERSARY OF PUBLIC SCHOOL 139, THE REGO PARK SCHOOL

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to one of the outstanding educational facilities in my district, Public School 139, the Rego Park School, which this year will celebrate its 60th anniversary of service to the community of Rego Park in Queens County. On October 19, 1989, the school will hold a special anniversary dinner dance to commemorate this landmark occasion. The following day there will be an all-day celebration with special events featuring performances by the students.

Throughout its 60 years the Rego Park School has remained committed to the highest standards of teaching and educational excellence. The school has concentrated on the fundamentals in helping prepare its students for future achievement, not only in academic endeavors, but also in life as members of the Queens community and also of our great Nation as a whole. This excellence is due to the commitment of P.S. 139's administration, teachers, and support staff working together toward the common goal of educating their students. Their success is evidenced by P.S. 139's student reading and math scores consistantly ranking among the best in New York City.

Over the past six decades the Rego Park School has been a fine example of providing children with unique and innovative programs. Included in these programs are special science classes and a great books seminar. In addition the school has sponsored a wide variety of trips to places such as New York's famous museums, the Statue of Liberty, and the Empire State Building. Its students have been exposed to cultural events including visits to the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Carnegie Hall, and Lincoln Center. Ten years ago during the Rego Park's School golden anniversary celebration, the graduating class made a trip to Washington, DC. As the guests of our late colleague, Joseph P. Addabbo, the students toured the Capitol, highlighted by a visit to the House gallery.

P.S. 139 is part of our country's long legacy of public education. We, in the United States, have prided ourselves on the quality and availability of educational resources for our young. Our goal has been to provide the opportunity for all of our children, rich or poor, to fulfill their intellectual potential. Schools such as P.S. 139 are the cornerstones of Rego Park and other communities all around this Nation. A special notice goes to Dr. Robert Fredericks, P.S. 139's principal; Edith Frishstick, the teacher's chapter chairwoman; and the many young students who have organized the events for the celebration. An anniversary such as this 60th for the Rego Park School reminds us of how we need good schools for the continued growth and prosperity of our Nation. Mr. Speaker, I call on my colleagues in the House of Representatives to pay tribute to all at the Rego Park School for their achievements in the past and to convey their best wishes for future success.

NEIL J. CARROLL HONORED

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, on October 14, 1989, at the Villa Nova Restaurant in Bayonne, NJ, the Bayonne Sicilian Citizens Club will honor Neil J. Carroll as its Man of the Year.

Mr. Carroll is being honored for his tireless efforts to serve the people of Bayonne, Hudson County, and all of New Jersey.

Frank Carine, president of the Bayonne Sicilian Citizens Club, and Luciano Ventrone, the dinner-dance chairman, joined a large chorus of admirers in praising Mr. Carroll's leadership, vision, and dedication to improving society.

"Neil is a community activist who has been involved in many community and civic activities," Carine said. "In all his endeavors, he has worked to help the people of Bayonne and Hudson County. He is a true servant of the people and the Bayonne Sicilian Citizens Club is proud to honor him as its Man of the Year."

I have known Neil Carroll for over 30 years. He served as my chief-of-staff for 10 years, and previously served with distinction for former Congressman Cornelius Gallagher, Joseph LeFante, and Dominick Daniels. He has worked on numerous gubernatorial and Presidential campaigns in New Jersey and is currently executive director and campaign manager of the Hudson County Democratic organization as well as deputy political director of the Jim Florio for Governor Committee.

Throughout his career, Neil has been a strong leader, an astute political adviser, and a trusted friend to many. He is well known throughout the State for his intelligence and integrity. He is respected for his honesty and his awesome political abilities. He is admired for his unfailing faith in democracy, justice, and the promise of the American dream.

Since I first began to work with Neil 30 years ago, my respect for his abilities and character has continued to grow. He is tireless in his efforts to promote the cause of the Democratic Party and our Nation: The guarantee of equal opportunity for all Americans. In every way, he is the portrait of the ideal citizen. He is committed to improving the lives of his fellow citizens. He is dedicated to protecting the environment, the health of our families, and the well-being of our elderly. And he is determined to ensure that our children have a future of opportunity and hope.

Neil's service to his country started back in 1944, when he joined the Navy in World War II. He returned to the Navy several years later to fight in Korea. When he left the Armed Forces at the end of the Korean war, he embarked on a long public career that continues to make a difference today.

Neil's involvement in the Hudson County community reaches far beyond his government positions. He is a past exalted ruler of the Benevolent Protective Order of the Elks, Lodge 434, a member of the American Legion, and a member of the Knights of Columbus. He is active in the community of St. Andrew's Parish and has done much to support the Deborah Heart Hospital.

Neil and his wife Mary have been married for almost 40 years. Together, they have four children, Neil Jr., Patricia, Kathy, and Mary Sue, and three grandchildren.

He was a devoted son to his mother, Susan (Susie) Carroll and to his father, Cornelius Carroll, Sr. Cornelius Carroll was police chief of Bayonne for many years as well as the supervisor of the Bayonne sports program. Neil's late brother Donald had also served as supervisor of the Bayonne sports program.

Neil Carroll is a man whose commitment to public service is unmatched. With more Neil Carrolls in the world, the challenges this Nation faces would be far less daunting. But even with only one Neil Carroll, we have gone far in our community to improve the lives of our children and our families, and begun to lay the foundations for a better future.

Neil Carroll serves as a shining example of what one person can do to serve our country. I hope that many will try to follow his footsteps. And I look forward to watching and participating in his life's mission to make America a better place.

I know my colleagues here in the House of Representatives will join me in saluting this dedicated public servant, Neil Carroll.

ABORTION FUNDING

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the motion to agree to the Senate language on abortion funding in the fiscal year 1990 Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education appropriations bill. The Senate language permits an exception to a ban on Medicaid funding for abortion in the cases of rape or incest. The House bill already allows for Medicaid funding of abortion when the life of the mother is endangered.

Since being elected to the House of Representatives, I have always felt that abortion should be allowed in the tragic and unconscionable circumstances of rape and incest. The Senate language affirms this position, while otherwise barring the use of Federal funds to perform abortions.

I am personally opposed to abortion, but I do believe that expectant mothers and the victims of the crimes of rape and incest should be protected against life-threatening and criminally-induced pregnancies, respectively.

Last year, President Reagan waged an impassioned campaign to veto the fiscal year 1989 Labor-HHS-Education bill if it contained the same Senate language which allowed for abortion in the cases of rape or incest. It appeared that all Federal funding for health, social services, and education would be imperiled indefinitely unless Congress passed the bill without the exceptions for abortion. I was, therefore, constrained to vote for the bill, without the rape and incest exceptions, even though I believed those exceptions were needed. The president had boxed us into a corner on passage of this important bill.

Last fall President Bush campaigned on the position that there should be exceptions on abortion funding in cases of rape or incest. I agree. It seems unlikely to me that he can veto this bill because of the presence of these exceptions.

TRIBUTE TO SAM MEYERSON

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, too often the seniors of this country go unrecognized for their many accomplishments and for the exciting and active lives they live even after retirement. I rise to salute a fellow New Yorker, Sam Meyerson, who recently retired after a 66-year career at the publishing firm of Simon & Schuster.

In the year 1923, Sam Meyerson was a boy of 14. As his family could not afford to allow him to attend high school during the working hours, Sam was to take classes at night, and seek daytime employment. With polished shoes and a hand-me-down suit, he set out from his parent's apartment in Williamsburg, Brooklyn to Manhattan to find a job. He was quickly hired by a fledgling book publishing company which had just been founded by Richard Simon and Max Schuster. Sam Meyerson was their first employee.

As the firm of Simon & Schuster grew, Sam Meyerson played a major role in its development. He progressed from chief of then mail room to assistant treasurer to director of mail order books. Later he became editor and vice president in charge of all business books.

After his many years dedicated to Simon & Schuster, Mr. Meyerson continues to maintain a busy schedule. He and his lovely and witty wife, Rhoda, now serve as business managers for their daughter's jewelry business, which designs and distributes nationally from the Empire State Building. Sam and Rhoda Miller Meyerson have been married for 57 years. An avid tennis player who learned to play the game on the bumpy lawns of Prospect Park in Brooklyn during Bill Tilden's era, Sam Meyerson can still be found on the tennis courts two or three times a week, playing singles or doubles.

Sam Meyerson has established an unusual mark in work longevity and perseverance which contributed to this country's prominence around the world in the field of book publishing. His friends and family are all very proud of him, as are we in Congress.

RECOGNIZING THE PLIGHT OF THE RURAL DISABLED

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, earlier this year, I introduced a joint resolution, House Journal Resolution 146, to designate the week of October 7 through October 14, 1989 as "National Week of Outreach for the Rural Disabled." My humble purpose was to draw attention to the plight of the 3.4 million rural Americans living in our country today who are disabled.

Unfortunately, this resolution did not attract the necessary number of cosponsors. I respect the concern many of our colleagues have expressed about the proliferation of commemorative legislation. But, Mr. Speaker, I believe this particular resolution and the plight of the rural disabled deserve some attention here on the House floor today.

In years past Congress has worked diligently to make government offices, schools, and other institutions more readily accessible to the disabled.

However, these efforts have almost entirely been focused on urban settings. For many reasons, cost, and so forth, we have ignored or been unable to address the needs of the rural disabled who face their own unique set of challenges.

Many of the things we take for granted every day in urban America are much more limited in rural America. An adequate network of public transportation and quality health care that is affordable and close by would be tremendously helpful.

Educational and employment opportunities in many areas are few and far between. These are basic necessities of life.

And, of course, it's not surprising that social and recreational activities are much more limited for a handicapped person living in rural America than in our cities.

Fortunately, there are people out there who are attempting to assist the rural disabled and make others more aware of the existing situation.

One such group is the National Future Farmers of America—the FFA—which utilizes their educational scholarship and award program to recognize the outstanding accomplishments of young rural disabled Americans.

The FFA Program is known as BRIDGE—building rural initiative for the disabled through group effort. Selected scholarship winners are FFA members who have exhibited exceptional abilities in overcoming handicaps. A national award is also given to the local FFA chapter that has demonstrated the most effective outreach to the rural handicapped.

This is but one example of the efforts being made on behalf of the rural disabled. There are many, many more that could be cited.

Mr. Speaker, I believe Americans everywhere should be more aware and sensitive to the difficulties encountered by disabled Americans in rural areas. That was the purpose of House Joint Resolution 146.

I want my fellow rural Americans to know that I am deeply honored to be a spokesman on behalf of the thousands of Americans who daily face the harsh reality of being handicapped in rural America. I salute you for your courage and your perseverance.

Mr. Speaker, regardless of our action here in Congress on this resolution, I would hope all Americans would join me in recognizing this week as the National Week of Outreach for the Rural Disabled.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION TO PROHIBIT EXTRANEOUS MATTERS IN RECONCILIATION BILLS

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce a House resolution to reform the budget process here in the House by prohibiting extraneous matters on reconciliation bills. This change in the House rules is made necessary by the budgetary mess in which we find ourselves.

On October 16, just a few days away, the Congress is about to experience a train wreck in the budget process. On October 16, there will be a final report issued by the Office of Management and Budget, accompanied by a final order signed by the President, indicating that we have failed to meet our budgetary targets for fiscal year 1990, and invoking across-the-board spending cuts in discretionary Federal programs of at least 4.3 percent for defense programs and 5.3 percent for domestic discretionary programs.

How did we get ourselves into this mess? Because we failed to pass a reconciliation bill in a timely fashion. That reconciliation bill is the vehicle in our budgetary process that makes the programmatic savings in entitlement and other programs necessary to meet the savings targets in the springtime budget resolution. Under the Budget Act, that reconciliation bill is to be passed by June 15. Yet here we are in October, debating the bill for the first time, with the Senate yet to act.

And why have we failed to pass a reconciliation bill on time? In large part, because the reconciliation bill before us, H.R. 3299, has become a Christmas tree, including all sorts of extraneous, unnecessary, and many times controversial provisions that have nothing to do with the budgetary savings that are supposed to be the purpose of the bill. H.R. 3299 is a huge bill, taking up two volumes, 1,935 pages long, weighing 6½ pounds.

Unlike the Senate, which has certain restrictions against this kind of piling on of legislation, the House has no rule against attachment of extraneous provisions. Mr. Speaker, the experience we are undergoing this year proves that such a rule is necessary. Consequently, I am calling for the enactment of the resolution I introduce today. In fact, the best place to enact it would be as part of the reconciliation bill we have under consideration.

This provision has been introduced as part of the package of reforms proposed by the Republican leadership and others. But the need for this specific change in the rules is overwhelming and urgent. What has happened this year must never happen again. I urge the adoption of this resolution.

AFRICAN-AMERICAN CULTURAL AND HISTORICAL MUSEUMS WEEK

HON. KWEISI MFUME

OF MARYLAND

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation designating the week of April 16, through 22, 1990 as "African-American Cultural and Historical Museum Week." This initiative will serve to promote and encourage the progress of the many fine institutions around the country who have brought greater understanding of African-American history and culture to millions of Americans.

Since the late 1800's, African-American museums have increased from a handful of underground museums to nearly 100 diverse and vibrant institutions in nearly 90 percent of the Nation's cities today. Their budgets range from $2,000 to more than $1,300,000 and range between an annual 400 to 200,000 visitors.

While many of these museums share similar characteristics, each has made a distinctive contribution to the broadening of our knowledge of the active participation of African-Americans in the development of this Nation. These museums also play an important role in the propagation of African-American history as a whole and have brought a greater understanding of the contributions made by individuals of African ancestry to all Americans.

These indispensable institutions have instilled a strong sense of cultural identity and personal inspiration to people both within and outside the African-American community. Furthermore, these museums have preserved the splendid culture of African-Americans and ensured the proper interpretation of their outstanding achievements that have impacted this Nation and the entire world.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, African-American historical and cultural museums are vehicles for educating and preserving the saga of the black experience for everyone, but especially for the communities they represent. Similar to other museums, African-American historical and cultural museums collect and use artifacts of esthetic and historical significance to instruct and learn.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to particularly bring to the attention of Members in this august body the great blacks in Wax Museum located in my own district of Baltimore. Established in 1983, this exceptional museum is the first to display life-size wax figures and scenes of contemporaries and historical personalities of African ancestry assembled in a permanent collection. The vivid and graphic characters and scenes on display includes great Americans such as Martin Luther King, Booker T. Washington, and Malcolm X and a number of lesser known yet important figures. I am proud to have such a unique and distinguished museum in my district, and I encourage Members to visit this celebrated museum whenever visiting Baltimore.

I would also like to commend the African-American Museums Association [AAMA]. This nonprofit organization serves to focus and work toward the needs of African-American museums in the United States. The AAMA has distinguished itself as the unified voice of the African-American museum commuity and has been in the forefront of advocating the interests of African-American museums, people, and cultural heritage.

I think it is quite fitting that we in Congress acknowledge the important contributions of African-American museums to this Nation. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution and look forward to having it passed by both Houses and enacted into law.

A TRIBUTE TO ANGELO K. TSAKOPOULOS

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Angelo K. Tsakopoulos, a dear friend and one of Sacramento's, and indeed, one of California's most prominent citizens. He will receive the prestigious AXIOS "Man of the Year" Award on October 13 in Los Angeles, CA.

AXIOS, which means "worthy," is an organization of prominent Greek American business and professional leaders from throughout the Los Angeles area who have joined together to promote, foster and encourage good Government and quality leadership; to assist deserving students through grants and scholarships to educational institutions; and to promote and preserve Hellenic culture and traditions. The AXIOS "Man of the Year" recipients include some of the most prominent businessmen, philanthropists, and community leaders of the Nation. George Christopher, former San Francisco mayor, His Eminence Archbishop Lakovos, primate of the Greek Orthodox Church of North and South America, U.S. Senator PAUL SARBANES, Alex G. Spanos, Stockton builder-sportsman, and Dr. John Brademas, president of New York University are a few of the previous outstanding recipients.

It is most appropriate that AXIOS recognize Angelo Tsakopoulos, for he personifies the American dream. He came to the United States in 1951 from Tripolis, Greece, at the age of 15. His first year he spent with an uncle in Chicago learning English and shining shoes. He soon moved to a more familiar climate, Lodi, CA, where, while attending high school, he began his entrepreneurial ventures by moonlighting in the melon business. He then went to college at the University of Illinois, Chicago, later transferring to Sacramento State University. During this time he developed an interest in real estate, working as a real estate salesman and as a waiter to support himself. But these demanding jobs did not deter him from finding the time to complete his education and from boxing for his university's team.

After serving his country in the Armed Forces, Angelo decided to pursue his interest in real estate. By 1963 he had opened his own company. Today, that company is one of the most successful in California.

From these humble beginnings, Angelo has established himself as a leader and a humanitarian. Over the last two decades, he has played a major role in the development of Sacramento as a prominent urban center. This role will undoubtedly continue because of his tremendous talent. The community's faith in his talent has most recently been exhibited by Southern Pacific Railroad when they asked Angelo's company to develop a 15 square block area in the heart of downtown.

However, Angelo's contributions encompass a greater area than the homes, buildings and industrial complexes he has constructed. Angelo has also donated his time and millions of dollars to worthy organizations such as the Asian Community Convalescent Home, the Sisters of Mercy, Catholic Diocese of Sacramento, the Greek Orthodox Church, the Folsom Historical Society, Crocker Art Museum and others. A firm believer in education, he has also sponsored many conferences on such varied topics as the United States Constitution, the Cyprus conflict, and the Armenian holocaust. Additional educational interests include his creating the Kazantazakis Chair at San Francisco State University, and endowing chairs and major programs at McGeorge School of Law, Dartmouth College, Sacramento State University, and the University of California at Irvine's Thesaurus Linguae Graecae Center. Furthermore, he has funded the teaching of Demotic Greek in local high schools.

Angelo proudly maintains ties to his Greek heritage by supporting many Hellenic organizations and by being an Archon in the Greek Orthodox Church. He cofounded Dynamis, a Hellenic organization; he is the west coast representative for the Society of Greek Heritage; and he is a major supporter of the American Hellenic Institute and the United Hellenic American Conference.

He is a devoted family man who enjoys spending time with his six children, two grandchildren, and his wife, Sofia. He is also an avid hunter, golfer, and helicopter skier.

Angelo Tsakopoulos is truly an outstanding American and a pillar of society. I am proud to honor him today as a great businessman, leader, philanthropist and friend. I know my colleagues join me in saluting him for all his tremendous accomplishments.

LEGISLATIVE ACTION NEEDED ON ASSAULT WEAPONS

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I rise again today in support of Federal legislation banning semiautomatic assault weapons and legislation creating a Federal 7-day waiting period before a gun can be purchased.

Nearly a month has passed since the tragic shooting at the Standard Gravure plant in Louisville and concerned citizens, organizations, and community groups are continuing to work together to enact sensible State and Federal gun laws.

Recently I read in the Louisville Courier-Journal that leaders of the unions representing employees at Standard Gravure have joined the calls for a State assault-weapons ban in Kentucky. Many of the 9 dead and 13 wounded in the gunfire at the plant were union members.

Don Frazier of local 19N, and Jim Jenkins of local 552M of the Graphic Communications Union, and John McCarty of Mailers local 99 should be commended for taking the lead on this issue. I wish them good luck and stand ready to help.

Meantime, we at the Federal level must work for uniform Federal laws on assault weapons and gun waiting periods and I urge my colleagues in the House to support quick action on these measures.

SECRETARY BAKER MAKES RIGHT DECISION

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I applaud the decision yesterday of Secretary of State, James Baker, to make the U.S. Government a full state member of the International Union for Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources [IUCN].

Over IUCN's distinguished 40 years history, it has become the premier multilateral organization addressing global environmental issues. IUCN now comprises 61 national governments, 128 Government agencies, and over 400 nongovernmental organizations [NGO's] in 120 countries worldwide.

Mr. Speaker, today I would like to thank my colleagues in the House who joined me in a letter to Secretary Baker last month that signaled our support for his decision for full U.S. membership in IUCN. His decision demonstrates U.S. commitment in solving today's increasingly urgent challenges of tropical deforestation and global climate change. We can now expand our conservation role as U.S. technical experts from agencies such as Commerce, Agriculture, EPA, and Interior can better interact with their counterparts around the world to help save critical species and ecosystems now under environmental seige.

HONORING THADDEUS KRULIKOWSKI

HON. FRANK PALLONE, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. PALLONE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Thaddeus Krulikowski for being selected to participate in the Bell Atlantic-American Association for the Advancement of Science, Institute for Middle School Science and Technology Teachers. Mr. Krulikowski was selected to participate in the program because of the outstanding contributions he has made to the district's science and computer education programs.

During this prestigious program, Mr. Krulikowski completed a graduate course on communications and information technology at George Washington University. Throughout the course, Mr. Krulikowski worked closely with distinguished scientists to develop educational materials tailored for use in the classroom. As a result, Mr. Krulikowski is now helping other teachers to improve the quality of their computer education programs.

As one of his former students, I know from experience that Mr. Krulikowski is one of New Jersey's finest educators. What I find particularly noteworthy is that Mr. Krulikowski continues to extend his knowledge for the benefit of the community. In addition to his 26 years of teaching in the Long Branch Middle School, Mr. Krulikowski has had the responsibility of coordinating computer education technology courses for the district, and has served as a computer consultant to the Long Branch Ronald McDonald House. He is also an instructor for the Monmouth Adult Education Commission. For years, he has been an active member of the Long Branch Education Association, the Monmouth County Education Association, and the New Jersey Education Association.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I extend congratulations to Mr. Krulikowski. His selfless dedication to education has enriched the lives of thousands of students.

TRIBUTE TO PAT FLANAGAN

HON. NANCY PELOSI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, Pat Flanagan is practically a San Francisco monument, and certainly a permanent fixture in Fish Alley. He has devoted his life's energies to Fishermen's Wharf and the fishing industry that created San Francisco's historic wharf.

Pat has made an immeasurable contribution to our community. His vigilance in safeguarding San Francisco Bay's waters and fisheries is unflagging. San Francisco's fishing industry is only as good as the quality of water where fish are taken.

One of the first red flags waved on excessive dredging and disposal activities in San Francisco Bay was by Pat Flanagan. Through Pat's surveillance, it was discovered that these activities were contributing to a decline in water quality and fish species near the Alcatraz dumpsite.

Thanks to Pat's efforts, this problem was elevated to attract the attention of a broad constituency of fishermen, environmentalists, Federal agencies, and lawmakers. All of these parties are now involved in a more comprehensive review of the Bay's water quality and the possible environmental effects of dredge disposal in the bay. Pat Flanagan may be the bay's best watchdog.

Pat's most recent publication is a report entitled, "Analysis of the Economic Impact of the Commercial Fishing Industry on the City and County of San Francisco." It represents 201 pages of blood, sweat, and tears—and love—for Fishermen's Wharf.

Pat Flanagan's dedication to the fishing industry and the high environmental standards that support this industry is to be applauded. Pat worked closely with former Congressman Phillip Burton to sustain the commercial fishing industry; he worked with former Congresswoman Sala Burton on the breakwater project; and in the same tradition Pat is continuing to convey the interests of the fishing community to my office.

Over these years of working with Federal legislators, Pat has played an essential role in building and rebuilding Fishermen's Wharf. Since the early 1970's, Pat has championed the revival of Fishermen's Wharf to maintain its practical and historical value and to keep alive the industry created by the waterfront pioneers of over 100 years ago.

Recent market studies conducted by the Port of San Francisco suggest that there are promising opportunities for establishing Fishermen's Wharf as a prominent seafood center in both domestic and international markets. A preliminary design plan for "Fishermen's Wharf Commercial Seafood Center" would provide a modern infrastructure for the fishing fleet and handlers, along with fisheries researchers to work side by side with the commercial fishing industry.

I look forward to continuing my work with Pat, and other Fish Alley dwellers, the Port, and the city to realize this dream for our community. We can all be thankful for the Pat Flanagans in the world who live to dream and to bring life to their dreams.

A BILL TO AMEND THE EMPLOYEE POLYGRAPH PROTECTION ACT OF 1988

HON. STEVE BARTLETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing an amendment to Public Law 100-347, the Employee Polygraph Protection Act. Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. YOUNG and Mr. DARDEN are joining me in offering this amendment.

One intent of the EPPA was to protect employees from abusive practices by polygraph examiners; however, the act inadvertently restricts some State polygraph boards from policing polygraph abuse at the State level. Many States have some type of polygraph regulatory boards that ensure that polygraph examinations are conducted in a professional and ethical manner. These boards conduct field inspections of polygraph examiners throughout the State to monitor compliance with State laws. Under section 9(b) of the Employee Polygraph Protection Act, these boards are no longer able to carry out these inspections. According to the new Federal law, polygraph examinations may only be disclosed to the employer, the examinee, or through a court order. This legislation would allow Government regulatory agencies to inspect polygraph examinations for the purpose of licensing polygraphers and ensuring their compliance with State laws.

I hope my colleagues will join me in quickly passing this amendment, which would enable

States to carry out the intent of the Employee Polygraph Protection Act, by continuing to provide adequate examination of the practices of polygraph examiners.

IN RECOGNITION OF CAPT. THEODORE O. ATWOOD

HON. BILL LOWERY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, the men and women of the Armed Forces serve our country with loyalty, integrity, and commitment. Navy Chaplin Capt. Theodore O. Atwood has served with all these fine qualities and a great deal more.

Captain Atwood has provided counseling and guidance to military families for 36 years. He has always gone the extra mile in his service to the naval community. He makes himself available 24 hours a day for needed mental health assistance. Most recently, he was instrumental in helping the families of the U.S.S. Vincennes during their time of unrest. He has made time to be an inspirational leader in the San Diego community. He also served as the head of the Dependent's Assistance Board, a one-of-a-kind program pioneered in San Diego to lend special emergency assistance to Navy dependents in times of severe emotional need. If a military family was in need, you would find Captain Atwood at their side.

Captain Atwood's selfless service to our great Nation has not gone unnoticed. His compassion and dedication to the spirit of human beings has touched the lives of many.

Mr. Speaker, please join me in congratulating Captain Atwood on the occasion of his retirement from 36 outstanding years of military service and in applauding his efforts at making the world a little brighter for military families around the world.

THE RIDGE-GOODLING AMENDMENT

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it was unfortunate that the House was denied the opportunity to address the Ridge-Goodling amendment during the consideration of the fiscal year 1990 Commerce, Justice, and State appropriations. The intent of this amendment was simple—should illegal aliens be given the right to representation during consideration of the 1990 census? I believe not.

Our Constitution guarantees equal representation to all legal residents of the United States. It does not and should not, however, grant this same precious right to illegal aliens. The Ridge-Goodling amendment would have upheld the principles of equal representation under which our Government was founded. It required the Secretary of Commerce to use tabulating procedures that are feasible and appropriate in order to ensure that illegal aliens are not counted in the 1990 census for reapportionment.

I do not believe that our Founding Fathers intended to allow individuals who cannot vote and who break the law the opportunity to determine the political makeup of our Government. The right to representation is a privilege—a privilege to be shared by those who abide by and respect the laws of this Nation. Those who have crossed our Nation's borders illegally are not entitled to this privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I supported the intent of the Ridge-Goodling amendment. That amendment stood on the basic constitutional principle: If our Government is by consent of the governed, it makes no sense to give illegal aliens—who are here without the consent of the governed—political representation in the Congress at the expense of those who are legitimately part of our political community. We must ensure the American people proper apportionment and representation so that all legal citizens of this country receive equal opportunity to be heard.

VOLUNTEERS CRUCIAL TO VETERANS' HOSPITALS

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, recently I commended volunteers at the Bay Pines, FL, Department of Veterans Affairs [DVA] Medical Center for their selfless dedication to caring for sick and disabled veterans. While singling out the successful volunteer program at Bay Pines, I hasten to emphasize that it is indicative of the volunteer effort in our DVA medical facilities nationwide.

Frankly, we just couldn't run our veterans' hospitals without volunteers. The more than 11.3 million hours of service annually performed by regularly scheduled volunteers equate to over 5,000 full-time equivalent positions which have supplemented the efforts of DVA employees. Further, organizations have demonstrated their commitment to the needs of veteran patients by contributing millions of dollars for supplies and equipment for patient comfort, recreation, or religious needs.

In the 42-year existence of the DVA voluntary service, hundreds of thousands of individuals representing themselves and more than 350 organizations have donated more than 350 million hours of volunteer service to the compassionate care and comfort of hospitalized veterans and their visiting family members. These volunteers perform in more than 200 designated and described assignments.

During 1988 alone, 85,000 volunteers ranging from age 14 to 90 plus contributed some 12.6 million hours of service to the Nation's hospitalized veterans. Indications are that this year's numbers will be even greater.

Mr. Speaker, volunteers are an invaluable manpower resource for our veterans' medical facilities. I'm sure my colleagues will want to join me in applauding the scores of individuals and organizations who so generously give their time and compassion to caring for the Nation's defenders.

THE REPUBLIC OF CHINA CELEBRATES 78TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, On October 10, 1989, people throughout the world joined in recognizing the accomplishments of the citizens and leadership of the Republic of China. This year marks the 78th anniversary of the Republic of China. From its humble beginnings on mainland China in 1911, the Republic of China has blossomed into a nation of industrial and economic vitality. The people and leadership of the Republic of China stand today as models for developing nations throughout the world.

The friendship between the Republic of China and the people of the United States has a long and productive history, in which both nations have benefited from commercial and cultural exchanges. I ask my colleagues to join with me in acknowledging the accomplishments of the Republic of China and in wishing President Lee Teng-hui continued success as a leader.

DR. NANCY SZWEC CZARNECKI, PRESIDENT OF THE JEFFERSON MEDICAL COLLEGE ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Dr. Nancy Szwec Czarnecki, the newly elected president of the Jefferson Medical College Alumni Association.

Mr. Speaker, Dr. Czarnecki has earned an important place in the history of the Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia. In addition to becoming the first woman president of the Alumni Association, Dr. Czarnecki is also the first woman to be accepted by and to graduate from the school.

After graduation from Jefferson, Dr. Czarnecki completed her internship at Nazareth Hospital, of whose medical staff she is a member. She is also on the staffs of Frankford and Northeastern Hospitals.

Certified by both the American Academy of Family Practice and the American Board of Family Practice, Dr. Czarnecki is a member of the Pennsylvania Medical Society, the Philadelphia County Medical Society, and the Philadelphia Academy of Family Practice. She also serves on the advisory board of the National Cancer Institute community health watch.

Before becoming president of the alumni association, Dr. Czarnecki served as vice president and as secretary of the alumni executive committee. She was also a member of the executive committee's dean search committee, and for 6 years was chairperson of the Jefferson career day committee.

Despite the demands of her career, Dr. Czarnecki has raised four children with the help of her husband, Joseph. The two physicians have been in a family-practice partnership since 1967.

Dr. Nancy Czarnecki deserves great recognition for her accomplishments at Jefferson Medical College. As the first woman president of the alumni association, she will serve as a role model to all women pursuing careers in medicine.

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE P. SMITH II

HON. JOHN T. MYERS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, anniversaries provide an opportunity for both reflection and appreciative recognition.

Twenty-five years ago, George P. Smith II, was graduated from the Indiana University School of Law with the degree of doctor of jurisprudence. Since his graduation, Mr. Smith has combined a rich and rewarding career in teaching with that of an internationally recognized one as lecturer and scholar and that of a conscientious public servant who has served with the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission of the U.S. Department of State, the Environmental Protection Agency here in Washington, and the late Governor Winthrop Rockefeller.

He has proven himself to be a conscientious and loyal son of Indiana. Indiana University conferred its Distinguished Alumni Service Award upon him in June 1985, and established an endowed distinguished professorship of research in his honor in 1986.

Professor Smith's writings are especially significant since they have illuminated many areas of human concern. This is especially so with his work in law, science, and medicine where he has shown himself to be a creative and insightful scholar.

I congratulate Professor Smith on his quarter century as a dedicated teacher and conscientious public servant and wish him another 25 years of fulfilling service.

TRIBUTE TO FORMER PRESIDENT JIMMY CARTER

HON. MARTY RUSSO

OF ILLINOIS

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, it's necessary to remind ourselves on occasion that in a world beset with problems and a nation grown perhaps a bit too cynical and anxious, that good and decent people continue to do good deeds, that serving the public is not the personal purview of those of us in elected office.

Often I have spoken here of unselfish private citizens and paid tribute to unsung heroes whose names never appear in a headline or on a plaque. Today, I take special pleasure, however, in paying tribute to a man whose name is known around the world.

Writer Stanley W. Cloud last month in Time magazine produced a thoughtful and informative piece on the man who "may be the best former President America has ever had." I agree. Former President Jimmy Carter has "redefined the meaning and purpose of the modern ex-Presidency."

The Carter Presidential Center in Atlanta, for example, is not just a library, but a clearinghouse for ideas and programs intended to solve international problems and crises. One of those programs is Global 2,000, Inc., an international aid organization aimed at improving disease control and agricultural productivity in Third World countries—led by Norman Borlaug, the agronomist whose work to bring the green revolution to India and Pakistan earned him the Nobel Peace Prize in 1970.

President Carter circles the globe—using the power and prestige that are his, not as a means to personal gain and self-aggrandizement, but as a vehicle to enhance support for programs that are to benefit others.

I commend Mr. Cloud's article, "Hail to the Ex-Chief" to my colleagues and I commend both Jimmy and Rosalynn Carter for their continuing work to make this land and this world a better place.

HAIL TO THE EX-CHIEF

(By Stanley W. Cloud)

In Ojubi, Ghana, on a sweltering African afternoon, James Earl Carter Jr. sits at one end of a large grassy field and acknowledges the applause of farmers gathered around the perimeter. Many of the farmers have samples of their harvest in baskets before them—corn, sorghum, squash, fruit. Large clouds play tag in the blue sky overhead, while at the opposite end of the field, the stern chiefs of several local villages sit dressed in traditional robes, each carrying a staff topped by a gilt talisman of his authority. On a platform in front of Carter, a local agricultural official in tan trousers and a T shirt bends to speak into a microphone. "President Carter," he says, "we are very grateful to you. Because of what you have done, for the past two years maize has been very wonderfully produced in this area. This is wonderful. In fact, we love you."

Jimmy Carter grins.

Jimmy Carter is a happy man. Despite everything—despite his disappointing presidency and the Iran hostage crisis, which helped deliver him into Ronald Reagan's eager hands; despite the scorn of various pundits and self-appointed guardians of Washington society; despite his own manifest and manifold weaknesses as a politician; despite "lust in my heart," "malaise" and "killer rabbits"—Carter has discovered life after the White House. More than that, he has redefined the meaning and purpose of the modern ex-presidency. While Reagan peddles his time and talents to the highest bidder and Gerald Ford perfects his putt and Richard Nixon struggles to gain a toehold in history, Carter, like some jazzed superhero, circles the globe at 30,000 ft., seeking opportunities to Do Good.

And finding plenty of them. One moment he's in China, trying to mediate between the leaders in Beijing and their unhappy Tibetan subjects. The next he's in Panama, prowling the streets before dawn on election day, paying a surprise call on the vote counters—bellowing at them in his "modest" Spanish, "Are you honest people, or are you thieves?"—and emerging to denounce Manuel Noriega for "taking the elections by fraud." Then, almost before you know it, Carter is swooping down on sub-Saharan Africa, trying to help eradicate disease or persuade farmers to enlist in the Green Revolution. And this week, in Atlanta, the former President is to convene negotiations—after a year of personal diplomacy—between the Marxist-Leninist government of Ethiopia and the Eritrean rebels to end a quarter-century of civil war.

With all this activity, Carter has emerged as the best ex-President the U.S. has had since Herbert Hoover, another one-termer whose failures in office did not prevent him from decades of productive public service afterward. In a way, Carter has used the White House as a stepping-stone to better things and better days. Says Carter: "As President, I wouldn't have had time to do all the things I'm doing now."

Busy as he is, Carter, who will turn 65 next month, and his marginally less hyperactive wife Rosalynn, who turned 62 last month, do manage to find time for more traditional pastimes: tennis on their backyard court in Plains, Ga., for example, and early-morning jobs wherever they may happen to be. The Carters also still read a fair amount. He was so impressed with John le Carré's new novel, Russia House, that he's rereading Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy and wishing he could meet the author; she has just completed Gabriel Garcia Márquez's Love in the Time of Cholera. And there is bird watching in Africa, fly-fishing from Colorado to the Andes, and furniture making in Carter's home workshop in Plains, where he has turned out, among other handsome pieces, the canopied four-poster bed he and Rosalynn—whom he often calls "Rosie"—share.

But leisure time has never been that important to Carter. If he and Rosalynn, having written no fewer than six books between them since 1981, are giving their word processors a rest for a while, both still teach Sunday school whenever they're home. And both periodically don their carpenter's aprons, pack up their hammers, saws and chisels, and travel to the South Bronx or Philadelphia or, next year, Tijuana, Mexico, to help build low-cost housing. More than anything else, the picture of Jimmy Carter wearing a baseball cap, faded jeans and running shoes, and helping build a new house, like a good neighbor at a Georgia barn raising, captures the essence of his ex-presidency.

Not that he and Rosalynn haven't had their share of defeats and sadness: the closely spaced deaths in 1983 of his younger sister Ruth of cancer and his famous mother Miss Lillian, followed by the loss of his antic younger brother Billy last year. Even so, in the couple's 1987 book, Everything to Gain, Rosalynn wrote, "If we have not achieved our early dreams, we must either find new ones or see what we can salvage from the old. If we have accomplished what we set out to do in our youth, then we need not weep like Alexander the Great that we have no more worlds to conquer. There is clearly much left to be done, and whatever else we are going to do, we had better get on with it."

It is a lesson the Carters learned the hard way. After the dramatic improbability of Carter's victorious 1976 presidential campaign, losing the 1980 election to Ronald Reagan was a terrible blow. The incoming First Couple didn't make things any easier. During the transition, the Reagans suggested that the Carters should vacate the White House early to give Nancy more time for redecoration—a notion the Carters rejected out of hand. "We were elected to serve a full term," says a still angry Rosalynn, "and we were going to serve a full term." Carter was wounded again when he and fellow former Presidents Nixon and Ford, recruited to represent President Reagan at Anwar Sadat's funeral, were assigned to the relatively cramped tail section of Air Force One. So the three ex-Presidents, none of them then comfortable in the others' presence, sat in nervous silence for most of the long trip to Cairo. (On the way back however, Carter and Ford began forming what became a close friendship.)

Adjusting to life back in Plains was something of a trial as well. The Carters worked, successfully, to reverse the damage that hucksterism and celebrity had done to the tiny Georgia hamlet. And Jimmy puttered in his workshop and began organizing his papers in preparation for writing his 1982 memoir, Keeping Faith. Otherwise, there seemed little to do but brood. The famous Carter peanut warehouse had long since been sold, for $1.2 million. The 2,000-acre Carter farm—actually, it's two farms—was largely worked by lessees. With enforced idleness came more self-doubt and self-pity. Says a friend: "Carter was pretty much of a pain in the ass at that time. He needed a lot of hand holding and reassurance."

The creation of the Carter Presidential Center in Atlanta turned out to be crucial to his self-rehabilitation. With his usual obsessive attention to detail, he envisioned the center not just as another presidential library but as a clearinghouse of ideas and programs intended to solve international problems and crises. The idea became reality when the center was established at Emory University in 1982, and even more so when its permanent headquarters opened in 1986. Located on 30 acres of woods and gentle hills in the Virginia Highlands section of Atlanta, it consists of four low-profile, circular pavilions connected by interior walkways and exterior colonnades, all in a modern, neo-federalist style with faint echoes of the White House and fainter echoes of Jefferson's Monticello. Inside, the Carters have adjoining offices, plus a small but comfortable apartment. Apart from the library and museum, operated by the Federal Government, the Carter Center, with an annual budget of $16 million and a staff of 125, is financed by private donations, mostly from abroad.

The center's many programs form the agenda of Carter's ex-presidency. Notable among them is Global 2000 Inc., an international aid organization aimed at improving disease control and agricultural productivity in Third World countries. The work is enhanced by the leadership of Norman Borlaug, an agronomist whose efforts to bring the Green Revolution to India and Pakistan won him the Nobel Peace Prize in 1970, and Dr. William H. Foege, the Carter Center's executive director, who played a major role in the worldwide eradication of smallpox. Global 2000's principal financial backer is Ryoichi Sasakawa, 90, a Japanese multimillionaire industrialist whose checkered résumée features extreme-right-wing imperialist activities in Japan during the 1930s, but whose later years have been devoted largely to supporting charitable causes.

The key to Global 2000 and the center's other programs is Carter himself. His hair may be thinner and grayer these days, his face more deeply etched, but he is plainly in charge. As a former President, he is able to gain access to foreign leaders, thereby often ensuring his programs the kind of high-level support on which success depends. On a ten-day trip to Africa in July, Carter—the first active U.S. President ever to set foot in the sub-Saharan part of the continent—swept from the Sudan to Ethiopia, back to the Sudan and on to Zimbabwe, Zambia, Nigeria and Ghana. The warm receptions he received from the heads of government were doubtless prompted in part by the many trappings of power he brought with him, including Secret Service protection and an opulent, private Boeing 727, complete with crew and a walnut-paneled double bedroom. (The plane is donated by the London-based Bank of Credit and Commerce International, another Carter Center backer.) Carter, the unassuming Plains populist who once banned Hail to the Chief and famously carried his own suit bag, retains a modest personal style but today seems far more comfortable with his perks. Still, as he said shortly after arriving in Africa, "I didn't come here in a position of leadership. I came in a position of follow-ship."

In Addis Ababa, where he stayed in Haile Selassie's decaying old palace, he spent two hours with Ethiopia's President Mengistu Haile Mariam putting the finishing touches on arrangements for this week's peace talks. In the Sudan, Carter had an hour with Lieut. General Omar Hassan Ahmed el Bashir, who only four weeks earlier had overthrown the elected government of Prime Minister Sadiq al Mahdi, to urge negotiations in that country's civil war. In Zambia, Carter lunched at the statehouse with President Kenneth Kaunda, one of the last of the old African independence-movement leaders, who hailed his guest as "not only a great person but a great servant of God and man," while, outside, impalas and peacocks roamed the grounds and private golf course.

Four years ago, when Carter, Borlaug and Sasakawa began trying to bring the Green Revolution to Africa, they signed up a paltry 40 farmers in four countries—the Sudan, Ghana, Tanzania and Zambia. This year there are 85,000, plus uncounted others who, while not officially participating, have begun to use the same improved seeds, fertilizers and farming methods that have yielded such impressive results for their neighbors—300% to 400% increases in corn, sorghum and millet. Although Carter needs and seeks the support of the governments in the countries where his programs are established, his team stresses local administration and the direct involvement of small-scale farmers, whose minds have been focused wonderfully by recent African famines.

At a 200-acre farm in Ojubi, about an hour's drive from Ghana's capital, Accra, Carter inspected a new corn crop literally as high as an elephant's eye. With a farmer's knowing touch, he plucked ears from the stalks, peeled back the husks and admired the golden kernels. This year 46 farmers are working the plot of dry yet newly fertile land. But Carter made a point of introducing one of only two farmers who were involved when the project began in 1987, a woman named Sarah Dazi. "As you know," Carter said with his large and famous smile, "in our country the women also take the lead." From there he proceeded to a nearby celebration of Global 2000's early success. He posed for pictures with farmers and their wives and applauded as brilliantly clad stilt dancers gyrated on their 150-ft. thin wooden limbs to the rhythms of a native band. Later, Carter was installed with great pomp as an honorary village chief. To signify his new office, he was given a chief's robe and a hand-carved wooden stool decorated with tribal symbols of nyansapow (cooperation).

For Carter, improved agricultural output is closely linked to the disease-control measures he is also promoting. Seriously ill farmers, he reasons, cannot plant and harvest. Polio and river blindness are two major afflictions that the team hopes eventually to eliminate. But as a demonstration project, Global 2000 has first targeted the vulnerable life cycle of the Guinea worm. Once common in many parts of the world, the worm, which is ingested in drinking water drawn from ponds, is today confined to a belt across central Africa and the subcontinent, where it severely incapacitates some 10 million people each year. The Carter Center hopes to eradicate the Guinea worm in six years, mainly by educating villagers to filter or boil pond water before drinking it and by providing deep wells to replace freshwater ponds. Progress has already been made. Carter visited villages in Nigeria and Ghana that have, with Global 2000's assistance, virtually wiped out the worm. In a Nigerian village, he stood beside the local pond, under a canopy of lush green trees and reminded the villagers that the pond was still infested with the worm's nearly invisible larvae. While photographers snapped pictures, he urged the villagers not to drink from the pond unless they first used the fine-mesh filters distributed by Global 2000. Beside him stood a small boy, his leg badly swollen with a Guinea-worm infection.

Not all the villages Carter visited were completely satisfied with his help. In one, following the usual dancing and singing, the chief rose to speak. "You arrived last year from out of the blue," he said to Carter, "and you gave us a well and a pump." The village appreciated that. But there was this one small problem. Because the well is only 40 ft. deep, it goes dry three months out of the year. "We know that you, Mr. President," said the chief, "will not be happy with a half-measure solution to our problem." On the spot, Carter convened a meeting with his advisers and promptly announced that the well would be drilled to 70 ft. The chief smiled. The villagers cheered.

Next morning the former President began the return trip to Plains. He was relaxed and voluble about his new life, about his future plans (he will never again run for public office, he insists), about the problems he had as President ("Ted Kennedy had a vendetta against me") and about Africa. "I find Africa to be the most challenging and intriguing of any place in the world," he said. "It's facinating to meet with so many first-and second-generation revolutionaries." Carter has no natural enemies anymore, which is liberating. If he sometimes accepts money from donors with dubious backgrounds—Sasakawa, for example, or the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, which has been indicted on money-laundering charges—no one complains, at least not if the money goes to worthy causes.

In many ways, of course, Carter is the same old Jimmy; still indiscriminate with superlatives ("very wonderful"), still using what a former aide calls his "One Hundred Ways to a Better Vocabulary" approach to public speaking, still wearing the same kind of seven-league, heavy-soled wing tips he always has. But he's lost the hard edge. He's productive again, and seems finally at peace with the conflicts between his well-known born-again Christianity and his life as a public man. Says he on that sometimes touchy subject: "My Christian faith is just like breathing to me or like being a Southerner or an American. It's all part of the same thing—the sharing, the compassion, the understanding, the dealing with the poor and the destitute and the outcasts." If there is a bit of the white man's burden in that and if Carter sometimes falls victim to Christianity's age-old Catch-22, the sin of pride, well, it doesn't seem very important in the scale of things.

And you get the feeling that maybe this is what he thought the presidency would be like—all good works, no Ted Kennedys or Tip O'Neills or bureaucrats or special interests—when he set out from Plains many years ago, naively determined, against the odds, to make a difference.

POSTAL SERVICE OFF-BUDGET DECISION

HON. PETER J. VISCLOSKY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. VISCLOSKY. Mr. Speaker, on September 12, 1989, the House passed H.R. 982, a measure which removes the Postal Service from the Federal budget. I voted against passage and would like to take this opportunity to explain my vote.

My vote against H.R. 982 was premised on my belief that removing any program, service, or agency from the unified Federal budget is bad policy. It is an abdication of congressional responsibility and an evasion of budget discipline. By removing certain programs or services, the burden of budget reduction is shifted to those that remain on budget. Furthermore, by taking such an action, the true fiscal status of the Federal Government is obscured.

Every Member of this House is aware of the Federal budget deficit that confronts this Congress and our Nation. It impacts every piece of legislation we consider, every Federal program we wish to enact, and every service the Federal Government provides. If we are sincere in our efforts to address the budget deficit, we must be honest about the depth of the problem.

I firmly believe that in order to balance the Federal budget, all items must be placed on the negotiating table, clear priorities established, and all Americans asked to share in the sacrifices to be made. Just as no segment of our society should be saddled with an inequitable burden, no group should receive undue protection.

It is our duty to make the tough choice, to say "no" when it is not fashionable. We must not give in to short-term solutions at the expense of long-term stability.

In conclusion, I want to assure every member of the Postal Service that my vote of September 12 was not lightly considered or founded on a lack of support for the job that they do. Rather, it was based on my fundamental concern over ruinous budgetary policy of obfuscation, evasion, and illusion.

SKELTON PARTICIPATES IN CELEBRITY READER PROGRAM

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, during a recent visit to my district I had occasion to become familiar with, and participate in a unique education program. I was invited to be a "Celebrity Reader" by Sylvia Honeywell to teach her third grade class in California, MO.

My understanding of the Celebrity Reader Program is that periodically, through the course of the school year, people are invited into the classroom to read passages from their favorite works of literature. Then the students get a chance to discuss with the celebrities how reading has been important in shaping their lives.

The program does a good job of exposing the children to the successful people in their community, and of making those people aware of the outstanding young people we have in our schools. It would be very hard not to be impressed by the enthusiasm of these eager young people.

I offer this statement to the RECORD with the hope that it can be used to promote this program. It is a small, but significant opportunity to create positive discussions between the generations, which is the very essence of education.

COMMEMORATE THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CHESTER WATER AUTHORITY

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Thursday, October 12, 1989

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, on October 17, 1989, the Chester Water Authority of the city of Chester, PA, will commemorate its 50th anniversary of service to a community of 31,000 customers. The water authority covers an area spanning over 50 miles of Pennsylvania and Delaware linking the Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers.

The Chester Water Authority has continually enjoyed a tradition of dependable service to its family of customers and acted as a reliable safeguard to the natural water resources of the entire area it serves. This tradition has ensured its success as a public utility.

In 1989, the Chester Water Authority rededicated itself to recognizing that the health and well-being of the community depends on the protection and preservation of the environment.

SENATE—Friday, October 13, 1989

(Legislative day of Monday, September 18, 1989)

The Senate met at 9 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

PRAYER:

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer.

Let us pray:

*Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not love, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not love, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not love, it profiteth me nothing. Love suffereth long, and is kind; love envieth not; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Love never fails * * .—I Corinthians 13:1-8.

Eternal God who art love, in the context of so-called hard-ball politics, the word "love" sounds out of place; but help us to understand its power to forgive, to heal, to reconcile, to unite. Impress upon us the reality that love transcends controversy by infinity. And, let the love of God prevail in this place.

In the name of Him who is incarnate love. Amen.

DR. A.G. GASTON HONORED BY NATIONAL BUSINESS LEAGUE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the National Business League will hold its 89th annual convention in Birmingham, AL, October 17-20, 1989. The league was founded by the late Dr. Booker T. Washington, who also founded what is now called Tuskegee University, in Tuskegee, AL.

On Friday night, October 20, 1989, the National Business League will bestow its highest award on Dr. A.G. Gaston, an Alabama entrepreneurial pioneer, for his 66 years of success in business.

Dr. Gaston's successful business life unfolds in story-book form. He says that every business that he has ever started was based on a real need in the community. He filled each need as he recognized it.

In 1923, Dr. Gaston started an insurance company in Birmingham, AL, with less than $500. It was an offshoot of the Booker T. Washington burial society. It became the nucleus of a network of corporations which he now owns or controls with combined assets in excess of $95,000,000.

In 1939, he and his wife, Minnie, founded the Booker T. Washington Business College in Birmingham, AL, because they could not find enough qualified clerks and typists to service their businesses. Although Dr. Gaston says that they never intended to make any money out of it, it proved to be a very lucrative investment during the war. Today, the business college is owned and operated by Mrs. Gaston. She boasts of having graduates in well-placed government positions throughout the country.

In 1954, Dr. Gaston opened the only first-class motel and restaurant in Birmingham that would accommodate black travelers. It was the only public facility available to the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and his associates during the demonstrations there.

In 1957, Dr. Gaston founded the Citizens Federal Savings & Loan Association to provide home mortgage money for blacks who could not borrow it from other financial institutions in significant amounts. It's now Citizens Federal Savings Bank. Capital was over 60 million dollars as of September 30, 1986. In May of this year, the bank was rated the safest savings and loan in Birmingham by Bauer Communications Inc, of Miami.

In 1962, the mayor of Demopolis, AL, presented to Dr. Gaston the city's native son award. Since that time, the mayor has declared August 31 of each year as "Dr. A.G. Gaston Day" in the city of Demopolis, AL, for all times.

Not only is this 97-year-old stalwart a leader in the business community, but also in community relations. He firmly believes that money is no good unless it contributes something to the community.

Thus, in 1963, he founded Gaston Home for Senior Citizens because, at the time, there were no first-class nursing homes for blacks in the State of Alabama.

In 1966, he contributed $50,000 to a fundraising drive to start an affiliate to the Boys' Clubs of America to meet the recreational needs of over 2,000 boys in a high-crime neighborhood of the city of Birmingham. Police records show a 50-percent drop in juvenile crime after the A.G. Gaston Boys' Club was established.

Dr. Gaston's business, education and civic awards, honors and achievements are such that they could fill a book. However, I would like to list his educational background and the various corporations for which he serves as board chairman and chief executive officer. Dr. Gaston is a graduate of Tuggle Institute, Birmingham, AL. He holds honorary doctorates from the following institutions of high education: Tuskegee University, Daniel Payne College, Birmingham, AL; Paul Quinn College, Waco, TX; Allen University, Columbia, SC; Monrovia College and Industrial Institute, Monrovia, Liberia, West Africa; Edward Waters College, Jacksonville, FL; Alabama A&M University, Normal, AL; doctor of laws: Pepperdine University, Los Angeles, CA; University of Alabama; Troy State University, AL; and the University of Montevallo, AL.

He serves as board chairman and chief executive officer of the following Alabama corporations:

Booker T. Washington Insurance Co.;

A.G. Gaston Home for Senior Citizens;

New Grace Hill Cemetaries, Inc.;

Zion Memorial Gardens;

Vulcan Realty and Investments Corp.;

Gaston Gardens I and II;

Smith & Gaston Funeral Directors, Inc.;

Citizens Federal Savings Bank;

Booker T. Washington Broadcasting Co. (WENN Radio FM and WAGG AM); and

A.G. Gaston Construction Co.

Mr. President, I have known Dr. Gaston personally for the last 40 years or so. He is truly a financial wizard extraordinaire. He says that he never set out to become rich—only to fill needs. He is considered today Birmingham's most successful businessman—color notwithstanding. I can think of no one more deserving of the highest and best award of the National Business League than Dr. A.G. Gaston.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A point of having no quorum having been raised, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call at roll.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum but I ask unanimous consent that the time for the quorum call be charged equally against both sides relative to the tolling of the time on the Budget Reconciliation Act.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, it is my understanding the time of the quorum call would not be charged against either side under the Budget Act; is that true?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I might state that my objective is to stop further time from running on the Budget Act until we get back to consideration of the reconciliation bill that is before us. My inquiry is whether, if I object, the time would be charged to either side under the Senator's request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum call, if made immediately preceding a vote, is not charged; otherwise, a quorum call is charged against the time.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the effect of the Senator's request is that the time now is equally divided rather than the person asking for the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. I will not object. Parliamentary inquiry. How much time is left to each side, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority has 4 hours and 6 minutes; the minority has 4 hours 42 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Chair. I might state to the Chair and to the Senate I intend to object to any further charging of time against this bill until we are back on the bill, if it is possible to do that. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator repeat his request.

Mr. HEFLIN. I ask unanimous consent that there be a quorum call and that the time be equally charged against both sides during the period that the quorum call exists and that the time tolled be subtracted from the remaining time of the Budget Reconciliation Act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEFLIN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to speak out of order until 12 o'clock noon, and that my statement in its entirety together with footnotes appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry: will this time be charged against the time on the reconciliation bill?

Mr. BYRD. Yes. I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally charged on the reconciliation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have great love and affection for my friend from West Virginia but some of us have amendments to this bill and will be foreclosed if the time keeps running against the reconciliation bill.

Mr. President, if the order has already been entered, I will not ask that it be rescinded but I want to state from my point of view that many of us have amendments to this bill. Unless we can start the clock running on the bill, we cannot offer our amendments.

I have great respect and affection for my friend and the Chair has already ruled on his request. So I will not ask that it be reversed now.

Thank you.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I fully understand the problem which the distinguished Senator from Alaska is addressing, and as I have indicated to him I will be perfectly willing to withhold my remarks until some future time. My remarks have to do with the history of the Senate, and always throughout this series of remarks I have only done them with the understanding that there is no other business to be transacted at that point.

So I would have no feeling at all toward the Senator. I would be happy to yield the floor and let Senators offer amendments if they wish.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I appreciate the generosity of the distinguished President pro tempore. But it would do me no good to attempt to offer amendments when the managers of the bill are in conference. I am trying to get them to come back here, and conduct the floor as managers of the bill and let us offer amendments.

So with due respect and gratitude I do not think even my friend's generosity would bring them back right now. We have to find some way to get them back.

I thank my friend.

Mr. BYRD. I thank my friend.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

THE UNITED STATES SENATE

THE SENATE FILIBUSTER—1789-1917

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, Filibuster!—bane of Senate majority leaders, redoubtable weapon of legislative minorities, target of editors and cartoonists' harpoons, the object of obloquy and scorn. The word is said to have come from the Dutch word vrijbuiter, or "freebooter," and passed into the Spanish as filibusteros, "who were West Indian pirates, using a small swift vessel called a filibote." [1] To the average American, it means obstructive tactics in a legislative body and is quickly associated with the United States Senate, and it is not unfamiliar to state legislatures around the country.

Obstructive tactics in a legislative forum, although not always known as filibusters, are of ancient origin. Plutarch tells us that when Caesar returned to Rome after a sojourn in Spain, his arrival happened at the time of the election of consuls. "He applied to the Senate for permission to stand candidate," and Cato strongly opposed his request and "attempted to prevent his success by gaining time; with which view he spun out the debate till it was too late to conclude upon any thing that day." [2]

Filibusters were also a problem in the British Parliament.

In nineteenth-century England, even the members of the cabinet accepted the tactics of obstruction as an appropriate weapon to defeat House initiatives that were not acceptable to the government. Opposition leaders had no qualms about the employment of wordy speeches to delay and hinder the majority. "It is told of no less a personage than Sir Robert Peel that, in 1831, he made no fewer than forty-eight speeches in fourteen days." [3] In 1881, the House of Commons sat for 154 days and 1,400 hours, 240 of which were after midnight. Debates on the Land Bill "took up 58 sittings," and on the Coercion Bill, twenty-two sittings, with 14,836 speeches delivered, 6,315 of them by Irish members. Nearly 2,000 points of order were raised during the session. Speaker Brand, on January 31, after a sitting of forty-one hours, declared, "Mr. Parnell [the Irish Leader], with his minority of 24, dominates the House. When will the House take courage and reform its procedure?" Speaker Brand then "simply put the question." [4]

That the members of the British Parliament were not alone in the use of lengthy speeches as a means of obstruction is clear from the "wonderful examples on record":

> How modest seems the seven-hour obstruction speech of the Social Democrat, Antrick, in the German Reichstag, and even the twelve-hour oratorical effort of Dr. Lecher in the Austrian House of Deputies, compared with a twenty-six-hour speech which was delivered in 1893 in the parliament of British Columbia, or with the thirty-seven-hour address in which a delegate in the Roumanian Chamber of Deputies, in 1897, demanded the indictment of Joan Bratiano! . . . In April, 1896, a sitting of the Canadian House of Commons devoted to a bill dealing with the schools in Manitoba lasted a hundred and eighty hours, and in Chile a single speech is reported to have extended through ten days of a session." [5]

France, too, had her troubles, undoubtedly, the word cloture coming from the French.

There was protracted debate in the first session of the First Congress regarding the permanent site for the location of the Capital. Fisher Ames, a member of the House from Massachusetts, complained that "the minority . . . make every exertion to . . . delay the business." [6] Senator William Maclay of Pennslyvania complained that "every endeavour was used to waste time," that Senators Lee, Butler, and Grayson "refused to go on the Business as Gunn was absent," and that, when Senator Gunn finally arrived, "then they wanted to go and see the Ballon let off," the reference being to a hot-air balloon that was one hundred feet in circumference, the ascension of which had been much advertised. (Incidentally, the balloon caught fire, and "the experiment ended in failure.") [7] Maclay observed that "there is really such a thing as Worrying weak or indifferent Men into a Vote," and that "no business ever could have a decision, if Minority Members, were permitted to move reconsiderations, Under every pretense of new Argument." [8]

Long speeches and other obstructionist tactics were more characteristic of the House than of the Senate in the early years. But the House, on February 27, 1811, "decided . . . that after the previous question was decided in the affirmative, the main question should not be debated." [9]

The Senate was a much smaller body and the members were more staid and polite and dignified than were the members of the House, where most of the action occurred and most of the spectacular battles were fought prior to the Jacksonian era. However, with the election of John Randolph of Virginia to the Senate in 1825, the speech-making landscape began to change. Randolph had served previously in the House where he had been notorious for his extreme eccentricity and long-winded, vitriolic diatribes. Pity the person inside or outside the Chamber who came under the lash of his biting sarcasm and merciless invective. Randolph had fought several duels and was a man of ungovernable temper, as well as great ability, who engaged in "long and rambling discourses," whose friends "pardoned him as one half insane," and whose enemies "ascribed his irrationality to drink." [10] One may marvel at the incongruity of his sentences, the perverted logic, the roving discourse, the deluge of words that flowed with ease from the caustic tongue of Randolph. His speeches brimmed with irrelevancies; yet, there were often flashes of brilliancy in his long and desultory harangues.

Fragments from Niles' Register of August 26, 1826, will amply demonstrate his elocutionary dexterity during debate on a bill adding to the number of circuit judges, with not one word by Randolph concerning the subject matter of the debate.

Randolph made a passing reference to difficulties "where the legislature or the judicature is separated by any long interval of space, an interval in practice, not an interval in distance—I count as the German store wagoners do, by hours, not by miles."

Then, after a brief reference to how the Whigs "always toasted the constitution, church and state," he returned to the "difficulty . . . of distance; it is as the squares of the distances; I should not be far wrong if I should say it was as the cube—it is like the misery of wearing spectacles and taking care of a spectacle case—it is as the square of the diameters." From there, he made a quantum leap to the Dismal Swamp Canal bill and then to the gerrymanderings of states into districts by "canals and roads for the purpose . . . of pleasing men, and not for doing good to the public . . . for the purpose of making a job . . . all the other cows in our pen having ceased to give any milk." He then turned to the construction of roads in Ireland, "where they have the finest roads in the world," but they "were not intended for the benefit of the Irish." Randolph bemoaned the "taxes imposed on the poor Irish. What is it to them," he asked, "whether there are roads or not, who go with naked feet?" The subject turned abruptly to floods and droughts. Regarding drought, the difficulty was in getting "the earth to act as a condensor, not as a repeller and evaporator—c'est le premier pas qui coute—then, sir, it never rains—but it pours." Randolph then averred that "we are to take our measures for man as he is—not the creature he is described to be . . . in Eutopias, Atlantus's or in romances of any sort." In the fortification of a town, every man would pursue his own interests and make out his own case. "Leave it to a committee of carpenters", he declaimed, "and a bill will be brought in to fortify the city with wood; leave it to the tanner, and it will be leather; leave it to the stone-mason, and it will be stone." Randolph continued: "Then comes this bog trotter, with his spade on his shoulder, and his wheelbarrow in his hand, and says there is nothing, my dear sir, like turf—all fortifications should be made of turf."

Randolph acknowledged that he had "fallen into a bad habit, when addressing the Senate, of saying too much—ne quid nimis," and then plunged right in to a reference to "the people." And who were the people, he asked rhetorically, and then proceeded to provide his own answer: "They who are now turning the furrow and whistling—I hope they have the heart to whistle—while their corn is putting in the ground, and they are giving it the first working." These were the people, allowed Randolph, "out of whose corn houses the horses and asses of Washington are to be fatted."

Then followed a long discourse on slavery and life in the South, and the statement that there was "not a family in the State of Virginia, who, in point of fine mahogany furniture, Turkey carpets, expensive wine, great show . . . who maintain a style of expense equal to that, I won't say of a chief clerk, but a secondary clerk in our departments here."

In his address to the Senate, Randolph said that he had been held up "as any man will be who speaks his mind fairly and boldly, without any qualification, as a blackish sort of a white, and a whitish sort of a black—as an advocate for slavery in the abstract." Then he spoke admirably of Britain's Lord Liverpool who, he said, felt his way "as every wise statesman and physician does" instead of rushing onward "like a rash young man, just come to his estate—put a beggar on horseback and he will ride to the devil . . . who spends, and thinks he cannot get rid of it quick enough, and instead of ten years finds it does not last two."

The vast expanse of Randolph's loquacity knew no limits. "What is the Baconian philosophy?" queried the Senator. "A philosophy of induction—of severe reasoning founded on severe experiment—founded not on one experiment" but on many. "Sir Joseph Banks," he announced, "made but one experiment to make the fleas into lobsters, according to Pindar, but they would not become lobsters, damn their souls." Wondered the irrepressible Randolph, "how do you know, if he had made another experiment, but he would have succeeded—perhaps the want of some acid or alkali prevented it."

Nor was the press to escape his excoriation. "The press is at this moment bribed—it is in the hands of some of the most profligate men of this country." As to abuse in the newspapers and anonymous letters, he never wasted his time on them. "Any man," declared Randolph, "who will write an anonymous letter in the newspaper which he is afraid to own, would, if you would give him the opportunity, put poison in your drink." Hence, as we can see, Randolph's speech was a stellar performance in verbal gymnastics, but there was never a word about circuit judges! [11]

Randolph served in the Senate less than fifteen months, having been appointed to fill an unexpired term. Failing of reelection to the Senate, he was again elected to the House and later served a brief stint as Minister to Russia, a post from which he shortly resigned. He was once more elected to the House, where he had served less than three months of his term when he died on May 24, 1833. Thus ended the life and career of this complex man whose volcanic temperament and virulent tongue could well have made him, in a later age, the arch-filibusterer of them all.

The dawn of complicated procedural filibustering in the Senate was yet a long way off when, at the opening of the Twenty-seventh Congress on March 4, 1841, the Whig majority determined to get rid of the Senate's official printers, Blair and Rives. A motion by Senator Willie P. Mangum of North Carolina to dismiss the printers of the Globe was debated from March 5 until March 11. The debate developed into a "prolonged and acrimonius contention, relevant to the subject but spun out by the Democrats through lengthy arguments based on grounds of constitutionality and expediency." [12] Among the most noted of the Democratic combatants were Senators John C. Calhoun of South Carolina, Thomas H. Benton of Missouri, William R. King of Alabama, and James Buchanan, who was later to become president. The arguments were lengthy and heated, with King and Senator Henry Clay of Kentucky engaging in personal and scathing terms, as the following exchange will attest:

> Mr. Clay. If there was no other ground for his [Mr. Blair's] dismissal, he (Mr. Clay) would go on the ground of infamy of character of the print and the Printer . . . and let him tell Senators that, the other day, when the late [former] and the present President, in a manner so honorable to themselves, were exchanging courtesies with each other—a spectacle with which every manly man must be gratified—that day was fixed upon by this Globe, as a foreign minister told him—for he (Mr. Clay) scarcely ever saw the dirty sheet—that day this man . . . selected to issue a tirade of abuse and scurrility against the President in power . . . It was but an attempt to prolong their [the Democrats'] power . . . and to force on them (the present [Whig] majority) unacceptable, unwelcome Printers . . . The time had now come, and he trusted they [the Whigs] should avail themselves of it, and . . . adopt the resolution. . . . Mr. King of Alabama said he was not disposed to enter into a long argument. . . . his indignant feelings would not permit him to reply to the imputation of motive by which it was alleged his side of the [Senate] were actuated. Such imputations were unworthy of the person who uttered them. . . . But who is this Mr. Blair, who has been so violently assailed on this floor? If his (Mr. King's) recollection served him aright, this man Blair resided years gone by in the State of Kentucky. . . . He was then the political friend of the Senator from Kentucky; his intimate associate. . . . Was he infamous then? He presumed not. He (Mr. King) knew nothing of Mr. Blair . . . until he made his appearance in this city some years past. Since that time, he had been on terms of social intercourse with him—had observed his conduct . . . and he felt bound to say, that for kindness of heart, humanity, and exemplary deportment as a private citizen, he could proudly compare with the Senator from Kentucky, or any Senator on this floor by whom he has been assailed. . . .

. . . Mr. Clay of Kentucky said . . . he believed the Globe to be an infamous paper, and its chief editor [Blair] an infamous man. . . . But a Senator [Mr. King], who he supposed considered himself responsible, had gone a step further, and had chosen to class him (Mr. Clay) with Blair, and to consider Blair as equal to him in every point of view—in reputation and every thing else . . . and for the Senator from Alabama [Mr. King] to undertake to put him on an equality with Blair, constrained him to say that it was false, untrue, and cowardly.[13]

Clay's words were so offensive that King challenged him to a duel. Clay who had once dueled with John Randolph, accepted the challenge. The duel was averted only when the warring Senators were brought before a magistrate and placed under a peace bond. The March 11, 1841, Newark Daily Advertiser had this to say:

"What a humiliating spectacle for the world to contemplate! Two American Senators arrested in the very temple of Liberty on an errand of murder!—How long will public sentiment tolerate men who thus publicly set at defiance the laws of God and man, and contemptuously violate the moral sense of the nation, in the very Halls consecrated to its protection!"

The obstruction wore down and the filibuster ended in defeat for those who launched it. The printers were dismissed.

Four months later, another delay occurred, this time on a bank bill, dear to the hearts of the Whigs but anathema to the Democrats. On June 21, Clay announced the report of the bill from a committee, but to the disappointment of Clay and other Whigs, the Democrats proceeded to debate the bill at length. On July 15, an annoyed Clay announced that the majority should control the business of the Senate and that he would offer legislation to that end, believing that a limitation of debate would carry. King of Alabama demanded to know whether Clay really intended to introduce such a measure to throttle debate.

Clay responded, "I will, sir; I will." King's defiant reaction was blunt. "I tell the Senator, then, that he may make his arrangements at his boarding house for the winter."

The threat of a filibuster was unveiled and clear. An indignant Benton blasted the "design to stifle debate."

"Sir," he declared, "this call for action! action! action! . . . comes from those whose cry is, plunder! plunder! plunder!" Calhoun, denouncing "a palpable attempt to infringe the right of speech," let it be known that he would resist any gag attempt.

Clay never pursued his announced proposal for limiting debate, as other Whig senators indicated that they would not support such a move. Debate on the bank bill ended with its passage finally on July 28.[14]

Five years later, in 1846, there occurred a lengthy debate on the question of termination of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the Oregon territory. Long speeches delayed a decision for more than two months until the Senate finally passed the resolution, and a peaceful settlement of the Oregon boundary was reached.[15]

Also in 1846, war with Mexico was declared, and President Polk asked Congress for an appropriation of $2 million which he intended as an initial payment to Mexico for territory that he hoped the Mexican government would ultimately be willing to cede to the United States. The House approved the request but attached the Wilmot Proviso, so named for its author, David Wilmot of Pennsylvania, prohibiting slavery in any territory so acquired. The appropriation bill came up in the Senate on the morning of August 10, noon being the hour set for final adjournment. Senator Dixon Lewis of Alabama moved to strike out the antislavery provision, whereupon Whig Senator John Davis took the floor. In the meantime, the House adjourned, leaving it up to the Senate to accept the amendment, else the appropriation would not become law. Davis talked the bill to death, saying that if the bill passed, the President "will feel justified in prolonging the war until . . . additional territory is acquired." Polk renewed his request for the money in December when Congress reconvened. Fierce debate again ensued. Senate delays tied up the appropriation for more than a month, but finally the bill, minus the Wilmot condition, was approved.[16]

On January 16, 1850, Senator Henry Foote of Mississippi introduced an omnibus bill to organize the Western territories, including California, Mexico, and Deseret—a vast area extending from present-day Arizona and Nevada to Utah, and proposing the separation of Texas into two states. Southern representation would be increased in the Senate, mitigating the admission of California as a free state. The Judiciary Committee, on the same day, reported a bill to toughen regulations governing the capture and return of fugitive slaves. These proposals, together with northern demands for an end to slavery in the District of Columbia and southern demands for a new fugitive slave law, set the stage for the historic debates which culminated finally in the compromise of 1850. Henry Clay unveiled a set of eight compromise proposals which he believed would settle the slavery issue for many years. The Senate wrangled, and Clay complained bitterly of the long delays: "To postpone, to delay, to impede, to procrastinate, has been the policy of the minority in this body. . . ."

Finally, legislation passed the Senate after the admission of California and other proposals were stricken, and only the provision for the territorial government for Utah remained. Senator Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois then pressed for passage of a bill to admit California. That measure quickly encountered sudden and stiff resistance. "Dilatory motions to adjourn, postpone, lay on the table, amend, and so on were employed, although by no means exploited to their full possibilities." The bill for California's admission passed on August 13, and the other compromise measures were adopted before the session ended. As soon as one proposal was settled, Douglas brought up the next. Where Clay had failed to secure passage of his omnibus package of compromises, Douglas succeeded in their enaction as separate proposals, piece by piece.[17]

On Monday, January 26, 1863, Senator Lyman Trumbull of Illinois, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, called up a House bill to indemnify the President and other persons for suspending the writ of habeas corpus.[18] The legislation was considered necessary by the administration for the effective prosecution of the war. The bill was being considered as in Committee of the Whole on January 27, when Senator Willard Saulsbury of Delaware, in lengthy remarks, referred to President Lincoln as "a weak and imbecile man; the weakest man that I ever knew in a high place." Saulsbury, stating that he had conversed with the President, repeated his assertion, "I never did see or converse with so weak and imbecile a man as Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States." Other senators charged Senator Saulsbury with transgressing the rules of the Senate, and the vice-president, after Saulsbury accused other senators of "blackguardism," ruled the senator out of order "in attributing such language to members of the body," and ordered him to "take his seat."[19] Saulsbury appealed the ruling of the Chair and proceeded to speak on the appeal, in the course of which he again attacked the president, saying, "if I wanted to paint a tyrant; if I wanted to paint a despot . . . I would paint the hideous form of Abraham Lincoln." The vice president then ruled that Saulsbury's remarks were not pertinent to the question of order and again ordered him to take his seat, whereupon Saulsbury shouted, "The voice of freedom is out of order in the councils of the nation!" The vice president then instructed the sergeant at arms to take Saulsbury in charge "unless he observed order." Saulsbury's response was, "Let him take me," and the vice president ordered the sergeant at arms to "take the Senator in charge." The Congressional Globe shows that the assistant sergeant at arms, Isaac Bassett approached Mr. Saulsbury, who was seated at his desk, and, after a brief conversation, they left the Senate Chamber. The vice president then put the question on the appeal, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.[20] The debate continued on the habeas corpus bill, during which debate Senator Saulsbury persisted in his attempts to speak without leave of the Senate after having been ruled out of order. The Presiding Officer again ordered Saulsbury to take his seat and, upon the Senator's refusal to do so, gave the order to the sergeant at arms to "take the Senator in charge." Saulsbury then said, "Let him do so at his expense." Here, the Globe records that the sergeant at arms approached Mr. Saulsbury, who was sitting at his desk, and that "It was understood that Mr. Saulsbury refused to retire, but at a subsequent period he left the chamber," a rather bland portrayal of what had, in reality, taken place, for Saulsbury, in a scene reminiscent of the Foote-Benton altercation in April 1850, had brandished a gun and threatened to shoot the sergeant at arms on the spot. Later in the day, Saulsbury again returned to the Chamber and sought to gain the floor and was again told by the Presiding Officer to take his seat. At this point, a roll-call vote occurred on an amendment, after which the Globe shows no further interruptions by Saulsbury.[21]

On the following day, January 28, Senator Daniel Clark of New Hampshire offered a resolution to expel Saulsbury from the Senate, the resolution charging Saulsbury with having brought into the Senate "a concealed weapon," having behaved "in a turbulent and disorderly manner," and having drawn "said weapon" and threatened "to shoot [the] Sergeant-at-Arms." Senator Clark asked that the resolution lie over until the next day.[22] On Thursday, the 29th, Saulsbury apologized to the senate, not for what he had said about President Lincoln but for the "violation of the rules of the body," following which Senator Clark announced that he would not proceed with his expulsion resolution, and the matter was dropped.[23]

The habeas corpus bill had passed the Senate on January 27 and had gone to a House-Senate conference. The conference report was laid before the Senate on March 2. A heated debate again occurred, with Senator William A. Richardson of Illinois threatening to "express, at length, our opinions in reference to this whole measure, to which we are opposed." Senator Lazarus W. Powell of Kentucky expressed resentment at "an imputation that our object was to do what is commonly called filibustering."[24]

The debate went on throughout the day of Monday, March 2, with motion after motion to adjourn. At about 5 o'clock in the morning of Tuesday, March 3, Republican Senator Samuel C. Pomeroy of Kansas was presiding when a heavy-handed parliamentary action took place. Immediately following a roll-call vote rejecting a motion to adjourn, Mr. Pomeroy, in a voice scarcely audible, put the question: "The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference. These in favor of concurring in the report will say 'ay'; those opposed 'no.' The ayes have it. It is a vote. The report is concurred in." Senator Trumbull moved quickly to take up another bill, and the motion was agreed to. Several senators had not heard the Chair submit the question on the adoption of the conference report, and, amid the confusion, when Trumbull moved to consider another matter, Senator Powell, unaware that the report had already been agreed to by a voice vote, insisted that the consideration of the conference report be continued and that he desired the yeas and nays on its passage. A heated discussion then occurred over what had transpired and was ended only by an adjournment until noon of the same day, Tuesday, March 3.[25]

When the Senate reconvened at noon, the heated discussion was renewed, with the opponents of the habeas corpus bill insisting on reconsideration and a vote. When it was pointed out that the enrolled bill had already been signed by the Speaker and the Senate President pro tempore[26] and was on the way to the White House, a staged vote was arranged on a motion requesting the House to return the bill to the Senate for reconsideration, which, of course, was by now impossible of execution. This was done, nonetheless, as a way of having a test vote which would give senators opposed to the bill a way of going on record against it. The motion requesting return of the bill was rejected by a vote of 13 to 25.[27]

The unsuccessful filibuster of 1863 was "the first in Senate annals which can be said without shadow of doubt to have been truly intense,"[28] and it failed because of slick maneuvering by the majority in the face of a small but determined minority.

The next filibuster of equal or greater magnitude occurred sixteen years later, in 1879. It marked a forward development in the attempt to deal with obstructive tactics. On June 16, the Senate proceeded to take up a House appropriation bill containing a provision that no money in the act could be paid "for the subsistence" of the army "to be used as a police force to keep the peace at the polls at any election." On Tuesday, the 17th, debate got underway and continued on the 18th.

Republicans scathingly attacked the provision, with Senator Roscoe Conkling of New York leading the opposition. Repeated motions to adjourn, points of order, appeals, motions to table, motions to instruct the sergeant at arms, and breaking of quorums went on incessantly throughout the night until the Senate adjourned at 11:51 a.m. on Thursday, June 19, to reconvene nine minutes later at noon.[29]

When the dust from the all-night wrangling had settled, thirty roll-call votes and nine quorum calls had occurred after six o'clock p.m., Wednesday evening, with little else to show for the all-night session. On Friday, tempers had subsided, and the bill was passed shortly before two o'clock a.m. on Saturday, June 21.

The bitter filibuster had produced two minor but progressive developments in the Senate's experience with obstructive tactics in parliamentary warfare. On Thursday, June 19, when the Senate reconvened at noon following the all-night Wednesday session, the following occurred:

The President pro tempore called the Senate to order and said: "The Chair is informed by the journal clerk that owing to the length of the session yesterday and its prolongation during the night, the Journal . . . has not been finished; and the Chair suggests that the reading of it be dispensed with until it be finished."

Mr. CONKLING. "I object, Mr. President; and I insist upon the observance of the . . . rule . . . which requires the Chair to cause the Journal to be read, first of all, after calling the Senate to order."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "The Journal can be read as far as it is made up; but what is not made up cannot be read. The Clerk will read the Journal as far as it is made up."

Mr. CONKLING. "I object to anything being done until the Journal is read."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "The Journal will be read as far as it is made up."

Mr. CONKLING. "There will not be anything done until the rest of it is read."

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read in part.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "Petitions and memorials are now in order."

Mr. CONKLING. "Has the Journal been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "All that has been written up has been read."

Mr. CONKLING. "I submit to the Chair that the rule requires that the Journal of the preceding day's proceedings shall be read. I demand the reading of the whole of those proceedings, and object to anything being done until the Journal is read. . . . "

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. "It is the opinion of the Chair that the Senate cannot be prevented from transacting business by a failure to write up all the Journal, and that the rule does not require an impossibility. As far as the Journal has been written up it has been read. The rest of it, in the opinion of the Chair, must be read hereafter. Therefore, the Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from New York."

Senator Conkling appealed the Chair's ruling, and Senator Frank Hereford of West Virginia moved to table the appeal. On a roll-call vote, the appeal was tabled, 33 to 4. A quorum not having voted, the Chair directed the clerk to call the roll to establish a quorum. Forty-eight senators, a quorum, being present, the question recurred on the motion to table the appeal of the ruling of the Chair. The vote was 26 to 4 in favor of tabling. No quorum having voted, the clerk again called the roll of senators and fifty-two senators answered their names. The roll-call vote again recurred on the motion to table Conk- ling's appeal of the Chair's ruling, and the vote in favor of tabling was 32 to 3, again no quorum. At this point, Senator Thomas F. Bayard, Sr., of Delaware asked that Senator Zachariah Chandler of Michigan, being present but not having answered to his name, be required, under the rule, to assign his reasons for not voting, to which the Michigan Senator responded that he viewed this "as an attempt in an unconstitutional manner to overturn . . . a standing rule of this body that cannot be overturned except in the regular way, and I will not vote to make a quorum to do an unconstitutional and wrong act." The presiding officer then stated it to be his duty to put the question to the Senate, "Shall the Senator from Michigan, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?" The yeas and nays were ordered and the vote was 33 to 0 that the senator not be excused. Again no quorum had voted, obviously because several senators who were present had remained silent, declining to vote when their names were called. The President pro tempore then announced:

"No quorum has voted. The Chair has counted the Senate. There is a quorum present, but no quorum voting. . . .

. . . The Chair does not think the fact that a quorum has not voted is conclusive evidence that a quorum is not present. On the contrary, in the opinion of the Chair, he has a right to count the Senate. He has counted the Senate and found that a quorum is in attendance; but a quorum has not voted." [30]

Thus, the Chair had ruled that the Senate could not be prevented from doing business when the Journal of the previous day had unavoidably not been completed; and that, on a call to establish the presence of a quorum, the Chair could count a quorum if one were physically present, though silent—a tactic known as "quorum-breaking." Republicans had effectively used the tactic, sitting in their seats and declining to answer to their names on roll-call votes so as to produce a no-quorum situation, and then answering to their names on the quorum call that automatically followed.

Filibusterism had come to full flower in the Senate, but precedents, though weak at the beginning, were being shaped to gnaw at its branches, if not yet at its roots. "To count a quorum present to allow the Senate to proceed to business, and to count a quorum on a vote in order to declare a motion carried, are different things." [31] The first step had been taken; the second step would await the passage of almost thirty years.

In the closing days of the 46th Congress, the Democrats attempted repeatedly to take action upon nominations submitted by outgoing President Rutherford B. Hayes, but Republicans, in the minority, demonstrating their adeptness in the use of the filibuster weapon, refused to consider the appointments and resorted to obstructionist tactics to delay action until the new president, James A. Garfield, could fill the vacant offices. The Senate that met on March 4, 1881, was evenly divided with thirty-seven Republicans, thirty-seven Democrats, and two Independents. In Volume I of The Senate; 1789-1989, I have already related the events which led to the victory of the Republicans when Senator William Mahone of Virginia, representing a breakaway faction within his state's Democratic Party, known as the "Readjustors," joined with the Republicans to control the Senate. The shoe was then on the other foot, and the Democrats filibustered with a vengeance. When New York Republican Senators Roscoe Conkling and Thomas C. Platt resigned because of a patronage quarrel with President Garfield, the deadlock was broken. The Democrats had a two-vote majority and, in the interest of wrapping up the session, they agreed not to reopen the question of committee control. In return, the Republicans permitted the Democrats to maintain control of the Senate's officers and patronage.[32]

Another celebrated filibuster was launched when a so-called "Force Bill" was called up in the Senate by Senator George F. Hoar of Massachusetts on December 2, 1890. The bill provided for federal supervision of Congressional elections and was directed against Negro disqualification and intimidation in the southern states. Republicans saw the legislation as a way to make political gains in the south, while, to Democrats, it represented an attack on states' rights. Democrats gave lengthy Senate speeches and resisted the bill with might and main. On December 23, Senator Nelson W. Aldrich of Rhode Island introduced a resolution making it in order for any senator, after a matter had been considered "for a reasonable time," to demand that debate be closed, after which, without further debate, a vote would occur on cloture. The resolution provided for majority cloture, following which no motions other than to adjourn or recess would be in order and no proceedings respecting a quorum would be in order except when, on a division or roll-call vote, a quorum was shown to be lacking. Every Senator would be limited to one speech and "not exceeding thirty minutes." [33]

The debate continued up to December 24, when there was a brief respite until Monday, December 29, followed by another short recess from the close of business on December 31 until Monday, January 5, 1891, when the Senate set aside the elections bill to take up currency legislation. Action was completed on the currency bill on January 14, after which the Senate returned to the elections bill. The vote to proceed to the bill was a tie, 33 to 33, broken only by the casting vote of Vice President Levi P. Morton in favor. The Democrats, who thus far had resorted only to speech-making, resolved to talk until the session ended on March 4. The Republicans were determined to overcome the minority by keeping the Senate in continuous session, and it became a contest of physical endurance. Throughout the day and night of Friday, January 16, until 6 p.m. on Saturday, the 17th, the Senate was in session, with Senator Charles J. Faulkner of West Virginia nominally holding the floor for eleven and one-half hours, during which the Senate was unable to muster a quorum for approximately eight hours. Not until 9:30 a.m. was the Senate able to maintain a quorum.[34] Between the hours of midnight Friday and 9:30 a.m. Saturday, the roll was called eight times, on procedural matters only. The sergeant at arms was ordered to request the attendance of absent senators, and he reported to the Senate that seven members were too ill to comply, one said he was "much too fatigued to attend," others would not answer the knock at their doors, Senator Matthew Butler of South Carolina simply "refused to obey the summons," and Senator James H. Berry of Arkansas "requested me to report to the Senate that he would come when he got ready." [35]

After this exhausting session proved beyond the endurance of the majority, the Republicans abandoned the strategy of continuous session, and they concentrated, instead, on Aldrich's proposal for cloture which he called up on January 20, 1891. At 2 o'clock, the elections bill, being the unfinished business, was laid before the Senate by the vice president, thus displacing the resolution on the rules change.[36] Concerned that a way would be found to throttle debate, the Democrats worked feverishly to find a way to displace the hated Force bill and, by allying themselves with the silverites, they were able to accomplish this. On Monday, January 26, Senator Edward O. Wolcott of Colorado moved to proceed to a bill making an apportionment of Representatives in Congress, the motion carrying by the narrow vote of 35 to 34.[37] The filibusterers had succeeded in killing the Force bill in a battle waged from December 2 to January 26.

In August 1893, a filibuster erupted on legislation to repeal the silver purchase provisions of the Sherman Silver Purchase Act. The country was in the midst of a financial panic, and the administration of Grover Cleveland supported repeal. Congress was called into session on August 7, and Senator Daniel W. Voorhees of Indiana, known as the "Tall Sycamore of the Wabash," led the fight for the administration. On August 29, Voorhees reported the House bill in the Senate and the filibuster began. Republican Senator Fred T. Dubois of Idaho was one of the leaders of the obstructionist alliance in which silver Republicans joined with silverites and "farmer" Democrats. The President had recommended repeal of the law. "Lines of battle were drawn; against the financial East, stood the Far West and most of the South. Silverites from the latter sections demanded more silver, not less. Free and unlimited coinage was their goal, their panacea for the financial ills of the country." [38]

On Wednesday, October 11, the Senate met a 11:00 a.m., and remained in session thirty-eight hours and forty-five minutes before adjourning at 1:45 a.m. on Friday, the 13th, during which time there were four roll-call votes and thirty-nine quorum calls, twelve of the quorum calls occurring between 6:20 p.m. Thursday and the adjournment at 1:45 Friday morning. Senator William V. Allen of Nebraska held the floor throughout Wednesday night until almost 8 a.m. on Thursday, when, "after having spoken some fourteen hours with interruptions" from eleven quorum calls, one roll-call vote, and speeches by colleagues, he surrendered the floor. On Monday, October 16, the Senate met from 11:00 a.m. until 10:00 p.m. Twelve roll-call votes and thirteen quorum calls occurred. The tactic of "breaking quorums" was blatantly resorted to by unabashed filibusterers. The yeas and nays would be demanded and seconded, then the obstructionists would remain silent when their names were called. Less than a quorum voting, the presiding officer would announce that no quorum was present though a plain quorum was in sight, and then he would order the clerk to call the roll for a quorum. A quorum would answer. The roll-call on the vote would then recur, and, again, the filibusterers would decline to vote. Over and over again, hour after hour, the ludicrous scene would repeat itself.

Finally, on October 24, the filibusterers yielded and a vote on passage occurred six days later, on October 30, the bill passing by a vote of 43 to 32. "For forty-six days, then, the filibusterers had performed upon the Senate stage; and the endeavor failed only because some of its participants deserted the enterprise." [39] Democrats had felt the pressure from the Administration and surrendered, leaving silverites too few in number to carry on the fight.

On March 3, 1897, Senator Matthew S. Quay of Pennsylvania conducted a one-man filibuster, hoping to include in a naval appropriation bill a maximum purchase price of $400 per ton for armor plate. On March 1, Quay had moved unsuccessfully to table an amendment by Senator William B. Chandler of New Hampshire lowering the price to be paid for armor from $400 to $300. Quay decided to filibuster the conference report on the naval appropriation bill when it came back to the Senate, hoping that, with the March 4 adjournment deadline approaching, he could force the Senate to agree to a figure higher than $300. On the night of March 3–4, Senator Quay, even before the conference report was ready for Senate action, put the Senate through one quorum call after another. When the Senate overrode the president's veto of a private relief bill by a vote of 39 to 7, with forty-four senators not voting, Senator Quay immediately suggested the absence of a quorum. Irritated senators made points of order that Quay was out of order in doing so. The Chair ruled that, when the presence of a quorum has been established by a roll call and no business has intervened, a Senator can not immediately thereafter suggest the absence of a quorum.[40]

In the end, Quay's efforts proved to be in vain, as the House receded from its position in support of $400 per ton for armor plate and concurred in the Senate's lower figure. Senator Quay had prepared a lengthy speech with which to wear down his colleagues, but, in the face of this sudden turn of events, he contented himself by inserting his remarks—filling 176 pages of the Congressional Record![41] But another arrow had pierced the armor plate of the filibuster; henceforth, following a roll call that shows a quorum present and without intervening business, a point of no quorum cannot immediately be made.

On the night of March 3, 1901, Senator Thomas H. Carter of Montana waged a successful filibuster against a rivers and harbors appropriation bill. With the automatic adjournment deadline of noon the next day, March 4, the outcome sought by Carter was a sure bet. He protested the bill's funding for small improvements. The bill went to its defeat.[42]

During consideration of an appropriation bill on the night of March 3, 1903, Senator Benjamin R. "Pitchfork Ben" Tillman of South Carolina demanded the inclusion for his state of some $47,000 as a claim for expenses incurred in the war of 1812 and threatened to filibuster to the death of all bills before the Senate by talking until the noon adjournment the next day. At his desk was a pile of books, and opened for use was a volume of Byron's poems. The Senate capitulated in the face of this threat, and the $47,000 was included in the bill.[43]

When the conference report on the Deficiency Appropriations Bill came up in the House, Representative Joseph G. Cannon of Illinois, speaking for the House managers, deplored the Senate rules which permitted a single member, by threat of a filibuster, to impose his will on a majority of both Houses. Cannon said that the auditing officers of the treasury, in the adjustment of accounts, had found due to the State of South Carolina "the sum of 34 cents," but the Senate had proposed "granting to the State of South Carolina $47,000." Stating that the House conferees had objected, Cannon said that, in the House, "we have rules . . . by which a majority, right or wrong, mistaken or otherwise, can legislate." In the Senate, he said, there were no such rules, and that "an individual member of that body can rise in his place and talk for one hour, two hours, ten hours, twelve hours." The House conferees, Cannon said, were unable to get the Senate to recede from "this gift . . . against the law, to the State of South Carolina." Cannon delivered a scathing condemnation of the Senate rules:

> By unanimous consent another body [the Senate] legislates, and in the expiring hours of the session we are powerless without that unanimous consent. "Help me, Cassius, or I sink!"
> Unanimous consent comes to the center of the Dome; unanimous consent comes through Statuary Hall and to the House doors and comes practically to the House. We can have no legislation without the approval of both bodies, and one body . . . can not legislate without unanimous consent. . . . Your conferees had the alternative of submitting to legislative blackmail at the demand, in my opinion, of one individual . . . or of letting these great money bills fail. . . .

Cannon went on to say that, in his opinion, the Senate "must change its methods of procedure" or the House, "backed up by the people, will compel that change," else the House would become "a mere bender of the pregnant hinges of the knee, to submit to what any one member of [the Senate] may demand of this body as a price for legislation."

Representative Cannon concluded his remarks to prolonged applause and cheers, but Senator Tillman's filibuster threat had prevailed.[44]

On March 2, 1907, as the 59th Congress was coming to its close, Senator Jacob H. Gallinger of New Hampshire sought to push legislation to increase the subsidy to American merchant shipping. Other senators opposed the subsidy as an enforced burden on the taxpayers. A Senate filibuster immediately threw a dark cloud over the adjournment landscape. Democratic Senator Edward W. Carmack of Tennesee, who was retiring from the Senate, took the floor on Sunday, March 3, and his obstructive loquacity consumed the day and evening of Sunday and he showed up ready to unload his vocal guns on the subsidy target when the Senate met early the next day. Senator Gallinger, not wishing to see other legislation sacrificed in the remaining few hours of the dying session, abandoned the bill. Carmack had triumphed (he died in a gun fight in Nashville twenty months later), and "Senators had learned well the futility of opposing a determined filibuster in a short session immediately before the automatic 4th of March adjournment." [45]

On Friday, May 29, 1908, the conference report on the Aldrich-Vreeland bill to amend the national banking laws was laid before the Senate on motion by Senator Nelson W. Aldrich of Rhode Island. A brief but bitter filibuster ensued, and out of it came some significant interpretations of the Senate rules that would henceforth strengthen the hands of opponents of filibustering. Filibusters on conference reports are inherently much more difficult to successfully wage than on bills because conference reports are not amendable, and that circumstance was a parliamentary disadvantage to the opponents of the banking legislation who saw it as benefiting the moneyed interests of the country. Republicans saw it as a way to deal with bankruptcies and other pressing financial problems facing the nation. Senator Robert M. LaFollette of Wisconsin, a Republican who distrusted Aldrich, led the opposition to the conference report. LaFollette immediately took and nominally held the floor for more than eighteen hours.[46] However, during that time, his lengthy speech was interrupted often for colloquies, three roll-call votes and twenty-nine quorum calls, twenty-four of which LaFollette himself demanded.[47] In those days, senators holding the floor did not lose the floor when quorum calls occurred, and LaFollette resorted repeatedly to the tactic of suggesting the absence of a quorum so as to force the majority to maintain a quorum while, at the same time, LaFollette was resting during the time consumed by the quorum calls. That LaFollette's tactics were not popular among his colleagues was evident from the interruptions of his speeches and the numerous parliamentary inquiries and points of order that were made during the many hours he held the floor.

Senator Aldrich, in managing the conference report, proved to be an astute floor manager and a resourceful opponent of filibustering. Important precedents were established as effective weapons in debating with obstructionist tactics. After the Senate had been paralyzed for hours by LaFollette's torrent of words and time-consuming quorum calls, Aldrich rose to a question of order: "We have had 32 roll calls within a comparatively short time, all disclosing the presence of a quorum. Manifestly a quorum is in the building. If repeated suggestions of the want of a quorum can be made without intervening business, the whole business of the Senate is put in the hands of one man, who can insist upon continuous calls of the roll upon the question of a quorum. My question of order is that, without the intervention of business, a quorum having been disclosed by a vote or by a call of the roll, no further calls are in order until some business has intervened."

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. "Mr. President, I just wish to suggest, in order that it may appear upon the Record that debate has intervened since the last roll call."

Mr. ALDRICH. "That is not business . . . My suggestion was that debate was not business."

The vice president then submitted the question of order to the Senate and, by a vote of 35 to 8, Aldrich's point of order was sustained. Subsequently, Senator Lee Overman of North Carolina inquired of the Chair "whether, after a speech has been made," the question of a quorum could be raised, to which the vice president replied, "The Chair is of the opinion that that is not in order." [48]

Thus, the Senate had taken an important step beyond the precedent of March 3, 1897, when Senator Quay had attempted a quorum call immediately after one had just been concluded and had been ruled out of order, in which instance no debate had intervened. Hence, the net had been drawn tighter by Aldrich.

Another signal precedent had been set in the 1908 session; namely, the Chair would count silent members present in the chamber in order to validate a division or roll-call vote on which a quorum did not vote. This evolved from a situation in which Senator Charles Culberson of Texas had the floor and was speaking when Senator Lafollette rose to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair:

The VICE PRESIDENT. "Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?"

Mr. CULBERSON. "I prefer to go on, Mr. President."

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. "It is not necessary for the Senator from Texas to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin when the Senator from Wisconsin rises to a parliamentary inquiry."

Mr. ALDRICH. "I make the further point of order that in order to make a parliamentary inquiry a Senator must be in possession of the floor, and that he can not take the floor by asking to make a parliamentary inquiry and then make any motion."

The Chair ruled that Aldrich's point of order was well taken and LaFollette appealed the ruling, stating that "a hundred times" he had seen senators rise and, "without any assent upon the part of the Senator who had the floor, raise the question that no quorum was present." "Is it possible," he asked, "that important proceedings in the Senate, if one man can get the floor, may be conducted here for an unlimited period of time in the presence of the Presiding Officer and one single Senator, he declining to yield the floor?"

Senator Aldrich moved to table the appeal, and, on a division, the appeal of Senator LaFollette was tabled by a vote of 32 to 14. Senator Thomas P. Gore of Oklahoma then said that the division disclosed that a quorum was not present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. "The division disclosed the existence of a quorum."

Mr. GORE. "It takes forty-seven to constitute a quorum . . . I should like to say that there are ninety-two members of this body . . . A division disclosed the presence of forty-six. As I understand, it takes one more than half to constitute a quorum."

The VICE PRESIDENT. "There was present a Senator who did not vote . . . the Chair has counted the Senate, and there is a quorum present." [49]

So, here again, a former precedent, that of June 19, 1879, in which the Chair had counted a quorum to determine whether enough senators were present to do business, had now been expanded to include a count by the Chair to declare a vote valid in acting on the business of the Senate, even though a quorum of members had not actually voted.

The forces of Aldrich prevailed and the conference report was adopted on May 30, 1908, but one other aspect of this historic, but brief, filibuster should be mentioned. Senator Aldrich's parliamentary acumen was demonstrated when he sought and obtained the yeas and nays before all debate had been concluded. As a consequence, the Senate was ready for quick action in proceeding to an immediate vote if an opportunity should come when no senator held the floor, thus bringing the obstruction to a sudden end. The usual course was to order the yeas and nays after all debate had ceased and just prior to taking the vote. The utility of Aldrich's forethought was evident at a later time when Senator Gore, who was blind, completed speaking and the vice president immediately put the question on adopting the conference report. Aldrich's name being at the top of the alphabet, he promptly responded. Senator Weldon Heyburn of Idaho sought in vain to get recognition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. "The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference."

Mr. ALDRICH. "I ask that the roll be called."

The VICE PRESIDENT. "The secretary will call the roll."

Mr. HEYBURN. "Mr. President—"

The secretary proceeded to call the roll and Mr. Aldrich responded to his name.

Mr. HEYBURN. "I addressed the Chair before the commencement of the roll call."

Mr. ALDRICH. "The roll call cannot be suspended."

Mr. HEYBURN. "I do not ask that it be suspended. It was started with undue haste. I was addressing the Chair." [50]

Heyburn had clearly sought recognition before Aldrich responded on the roll call, and, as one historian has observed, "it must be said that the filibuster was overcome by doubtful practice" and "for the first time since the practice had risen to great prominence in the Senate, a majority ruthlessly confronted filibusterism with restraints." [51]

Notwithstanding the sharp practices that had been used, the 1908 rulings were important milestones on the long road toward curtailment of the reckless license of filibusterers.

Filibusters continued to erupt intermittently prior to the adoption of the cloture rule in 1917, which is the subject of another of my addresses, but reference to only one of these will be made here, that being the prolonged debate in 1915 over the Ship Purchase Bill. The legislation authorized the United States to purchase, construct, equip, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade. World War I had begun in July 1914 with the assassination of the Austrian crown prince, Archduke Francis Ferdinand and his wife, Sophie, on June 28, and had spread to the seas, with German torpedo boats and cruisers attacking shipping. German submarines roamed the oceans. There was a shortage of vessels and, as a result, high shipping charges. Supporters of the legislation argued that it would bring about a more rapid movement of goods and reduced shipping costs. Opponents lined up with the shipping interests and attacked the bill as being socialistic. The Republican minority in the Senate announced that they would strongly oppose the measure, and a lengthy filibuster stretched the debate out, day after day, for weeks. Discussions went on into the evenings, and, on Friday, January 29, an all-night session occurred. Beginning at 11 o'clock Friday morning, the Senate did not rest until 11:15 p.m., Saturday, a total of thirty-six hours and fifteen minutes. It was a night to remember, a night of parliamentary wrangling and confusion, with the Senate tying itself in knots on top of knots. There were points of order in layers, with appeals, from the Chair's rulings, motions to table, quorum calls, demands that senators be required to assign their reasons for not voting, warrants of arrest issued for absent senators, and votes on the motions. Senators disputed the Chair's rulings and challenged the power of recognition by the Chair without the right of appeal; there were questions of privilege, and the calling to order of senators by the Chair, and there were cries for the regular order. The scene was one of wild uproar and choas. Finally, Senator Reed Smoot of Utah gained recognition and the tumult subsided. Smoot opposed the bill, saying that he favored the building of an American merchant marine by the granting of subsidies. Of the pending bill, he called it "undemocratic, unrepublican, un-American, vicious in its provisions, and . . . dangerous and mischievous if it ever becomes law." Smoot's was one of the outstanding speeches in the history of filibusters. A New York Times story, dated January 30, stated that Smoot "settled down with evenly modulated voice to an address that lasted, without even the interruption of a rollcall, for 11 hours and 35 minutes."

During his speech, Senator Williams of Mississippi interrupted Smoot to ask if he had "calculated the amount of money that he is costing the American shippers by his speech?" Williams opined that it was costing "$20,800 an hour" and that "if it continues much longer, he [Smoot] will very nigh bankrupt them." [52]

The Democratic majority had decided upon a strategy of continuous session, but, as always, the hours became as long and wearing upon the majority as on the minority, with senators sleeping "on couches in chamber" and cat-napping "in cloakrooms." [53]

Finally, after thirty-six-and-a-quarter hours, thirteen roll calls, and five quorum calls, the Senate recessed over to Monday, February 1. The filibuster then continued, with no sign of concluding. The session of February 8 began at noon and ran until 6:10 p.m. on Wednesday, the 10th, a total of fifty-four hours and ten minutes, during which time there were thirteen roll-call votes and nine quorum calls, six of the votes pertaining to challenges of the Chair's rulings and four occurring on motions to adjourn or to recess.[54]

At one point during the six-weeks filibuster, the Democrats found themselves having to play the role of delaying the action on the bill when several of their members went over to the side of the Republican opposition, and it was only after absent Democrats heeded urgent calls to return to Washington from distant points around the country that the majority party was again in a position to press for a vote on the legislation. Referring to the dilemma that had temporarily confronted the Democrats, Senator James A. Reed of Missouri said:

Mr. President, a few evenings ago we listened to a speech here that lasted all night, delivered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The Republican side of this Chamber appeared to be well-nigh exhausted. It looked as though tired nature was to bring a surcease to our woes of waiting, when some Democrats entered into an arrangement with the Republican side of the Chamber whereby dilatory motions were to be offered to this bill and a combination effected between a small portion of the Democrats and nearly all of the Republicans; and then, having finally secured the attendance of Senators who have been brought here thousands of miles, who were absent for good and sufficient cause, we now witness the performance of last night, when, by a concerted action, nearly every Republican in this body went to his home, to his bed, with the understanding that the verbal stalwart who was then occupying the floor would hold it until a certain hour, when these gentleman might rise from their couches, put forward another individual capable of talking several hours, a physical logician, an athletic orator, who could stand the exertion of remaining upon his feet and employing his vocal chords, the proposition being that again they would come here in relays, all of this . . . to deny the people whom this body represents any opportunity to have their will as so represented crystallized into law.[55]

In an effort to force the constant attendance of senators and thus avoid the loss of quorums, Senator Reed proposed the following standing order of the Senate, effective until otherwise ordered:

All Senators are required to appear forthwith in the Senate Chamber and to remain in the Chamber until excused by the Senate. Any Senator disobeying this order shall be in contempt of the Senate and shall be brought to the bar of the Senate and dealt with as the Senate may order.[56]

Commenting on the state of affairs then prevailing under filibuster conditions in the Senate, Senator Reed observed:

We have witnessed now for weeks not an attempt to do business, but an attempt to prevent the doing of business; not a purpose to come to a vote, but a deliberate conspiracy to prevent a vote. Senators have been arranged in relays, a part of them to retire to their downy couches of ease and to the embracing arms of sweet slumber, while one or two able-bodied and lung-experienced aerial athleles continue to pour forth a ceaseless flow of eloquence, which invariably would be characterized outside of this Chamber by language which is not here parliamentary, and therefore may not be employed . . . it might be said that in the attempt to defeat this remedial legislation gentlemen were willing to obstruct the very machinery created by the law for the enactment of legislation for the expression of the will of the people.[57]

Senator John Sharp Williams of Mississippi gave notice of his intention to move to amend Rule XXII of the standing rules as follows:

Any Senator arising in his place and asserting that in his opinion an attempt is being made on the floor of the Senate to obstruct, hinder, or delay the right of the Senate to proceed to a vote, the Chair shall, without permitting any debate thereon, put the question to the Senate, "Is it the sense of the Senate that an attempt is being made to obstruct, hinder, or delay a vote?" And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative, then it shall be in order, to the exclusion of the consideration of all other questions, for any Senator to move to fix a time for voting on the pending bill or resolution and all amendments thereto, and the said motion shall be decided without debate: Provided, however, That the time fixed in said motion for taking the vote . . . shall be at least two calendar days after the day on which said motion is made.[58]

Needless to observe, neither Senator Reed's proposed order to force the constant attendance of senators nor Senator Williams' proposed cloture rule was ever approved, and the filibuster was eventually successful after having raged for thirty-three calendar days. On February 18, the majority surrendered, and the matter was shelved. A sizeable and determined minority's opposition having proved to be insurmountable on the battlefield of the Senate floor, the Ship Purchase Bill was dead.

The precedents established in earlier filibusters—particularly in 1879, 1897, and 1908—and those which would come in the future would be as important as the 1917 cloture rule itself in guiding the Senate through future stormy seas of filibusterism.

OMNIBUS BUDGET RECONCILIATION ACT

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I express my particular appreciation to the gracious and accommodating President pro tempore. As it happens, I rise briefly to call attention to work which he set in order a little more than year ago, the subject of which we find ourselves once more caught up with on the Senate floor; that is to say, the problems of the finances of the Federal Government.

In 1988, the Congress established the National Economic Commission, the purposes of which was to inquire into the issue of the Federal budget deficit and its implications for the Nation. We had hoped for a bipartisan result, and, to a degree that might surprise persons, we got one. The then majority leader, now our President pro tempore, the incomparable chronicler of our institution and leader of it for so many years, Senator BYRD, appointed Mr. Lee Iacocca, Mr. Lane Kirkland, and the Senator from New York to be his representatives on the Commission.

Mr. President, the report of the Democratic Commissioners said something very simple. I would like, if I can, to take just a few minutes to summarize it. It begins:

Hamilton called it "political arithmetic," and that about sums it up.

This was the subject of his first Report on the Public Credit, sent to the House of Representatives on January 14, 1790, just eight and one-half months after Washington took the oath of office, and the great Republic commenced a beleaguered, problematic existence.

In this report Hamilton set forth first principles. "The political arithmetic of the new nation must balance. We must pay our debts, meet our expenses, establish our credit."

"Memory has faded of the absolute centrality of this issue."

The Constitution had come about because of the embarrassments that attended a nominal nation that could not pay its debt. Its debt had not been honored, and credit had collapsed. When the new Constitution came into effect, enlightened friends of good government rejoiced in the new integrity of our finances.

Let me quote one paragraph:

To justify and preserve their confidence; to promote the increasing respectability of the American name; to answer the calls of justice; to restore landed property to its due value; to furnish new resources both to agriculture and commerce; to cement more closely the union of the states; to add to their security against foreign attack; to establish public order on the basis of an upright and liberal policy. These are the great and invaluable ends to be secured, by a proper and adequate provision . . . for the support of public credit.

He then went ahead to say that the debt incurred by the States in the Revolutionary War had to be paid in full, on time, with interest. He said the intense interest of the European nations in seeing whether we would do this was understandable and that the fact that we were in debt was equally understandable. He made a nice point, and I quote him, about the nature of the debt of the United States at that time: "It was," he wrote, "the price of liberty."

Mr. President, over the years, as the Commission reported, the United States has recurrently gone into debt in times of national crisis—the most difficult was the Civil War—and thereafter has gone into surplus to pay back that debt. The 1980's changed this in the most dramatic way. During 8 years of the previous administration we incurred a debt, in a time of peace and general economic ease, almost equal to the debt incurred in the Second World War.

Now we have the aftermath. We have interest beginning to eat up our resources. It now requires the income tax of every person, man and woman, west of the Mississippi River, to pay the interest on the debt. That is a transfer of wealth from labor to capital of a kind we have never seen. Labor, income tax on what you earn; interest, what you get from what you hold and own.

Mr. President, it has paralyzed this body. We are here in the middle of reconciliation, and only the distinguished President pro tempore is on the floor. We are paralyzed. We are incapable of attending to the Nation's business. We are using the Social Security trust funds to pay for the current expenses of Government.

An elemental trust, a payroll tax, is financing this Government. It took us 30 years to amend the Constitution to provide for a graduated income tax. We have already repealed that amendment in our practices of the past 4 years.

I only wish to say that what Senator BYRD did, in appointing that Commission, was not wrong. It may be that some reader of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on this point would like to read the summary of the Commission's report of the Members of the Democratic side, which I ask unanimous consent be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PART I—THE RISKS OF WISHFUL THINKING

The National Economic Commission was created to find a bipartisan solution to an issue that had become increasingly divisive: the federal budget deficit and its implications for the longer-term economic health of this nation. The hope was that the Commission would develop recommendations on questions that had eluded the executive and legislative branches over recent years. The failure of the Commission to do so on a bipartisan basis is a disappointment to the Democratic appointees to the Commission.

Despite public accounts to the contrary, the Commission was not sharply divided on the basic issues. The majority of Commissioners share the same concerns about the future economic strength of this nation and most agree on the need for substantial deficit reduction. With few exceptions, the members of the Commission believe that our national savings rate is too low and that the long-term prospect for strong economic growth is threatened.

The ability of the Commission to fulfill its mandate, however, diminished as the Presidential campaign progressed. The Commission believed it was esssential to keep its deliberations low key and out of the Presidential campaign. Unfortunately, the campaign produced no real discussion by either candidate of budgetary problems and the effects of continued deficits. The President has stated a clear and strong commitment to the "Flexible Freeze" fiscal policy on which he campaigned. The Commission received clear signals that the new administration would not consider significant deviations from the "Flexible Freeze" concept. When applied to the Commisson's work, it readily became apparent that these constraints left no serious basis for discussion of any other budgetary approach, or any bipartisan recommendations.

We respect the Republican appointees' understandable desire to support the new President and his budget proposals. However, in our view, the administration's budget does not fulfill the mandate of this Commission and is not a plan that we can support. We reject the administration's approach because it leads nowhere. It combines a temporary fix for a long-term problem with economic projections that make the problem invisible for the time being.

Our first instinct when it became clear that a bipartisan consensus could not be reached was to prepare a detailed "Democratic" plan. However, on reflection, we believe that offering a minority plan is not what we were appointed to do, does not reflect the bipartisan intent of the Congress when it established the Commission, and is not our proper role. Our role, as set forth in the legislation establishing the Commission, was to provide a bipartisan plan to assist the executive and legislative branches bridge their differences, not contribute to more division with yet another partisan approach, as we believe has now occurred.

We are confident, however, that the Commission's efforts may be useful and may contribute to the ability of the President and Congress to deal with the budget problem. The Commission served as a forum for public debate on this issue at a time when the Presidential campaign in 1988 failed, on the whole, to address it seriously. The Commission and its staff have distilled much of the public comment about the deficit, from leading economists and policy experts and from concerned citizens, into a volume of background papers that will serve as a source for further discussion on the budget between the Congress and the President. And, most importantly, most Commissioners agreed on several important elements of the budget problem. Consensus on these points should energize the Congress and the President as they tackle the budget in the coming months.

We would like to make two basic points with which we believe many of our Republican colleagues agree:

First, that deficits do matter. Coming to grips with our policy of spending more money than we take in must be this nation's first priority. Rationalizations of the policy debacle that has led to the immense deficits are an irresponsible answer to a serious problem. Republicans and Democrats must work together to address the problem in a realistic way. We have heard from many prominent economic and financial leaders, including the past and current Chairmen of the Federal Reserve Board. The consensus view is that specific and credible deficit reduction measures are needed on the order of $30 billion to $40 billion per year for the next three to four years. We accept and support this consensus.

Second, that budget process reform is an important element of any deficit reduction effort. It should include movement towards biennial budgeting, clearer enforcement of budget goals, and other bipartisan proposals.

That said, we have four fundamental concerns about the administration's approach to deficit reduction.

First, we believe that the economic assumptions underlying the President's budget are overly optimistic, particularly over the five year period. We have learned through experience that when faulty assumptions fail to materialize, the anticipated real increases in national savings required for capital accumulation and economic growth are gone too.

Second, the President's approach to deficit reduction is inherently unbalanced and cannot be sustained over the long term. The proposals contained in the administration's budget have been severely criticized for their lack of detail and specificity, particularly those for domestic spending programs. However, even without a detailed list of budget reductions, the broad outlines of fiscal policy are clear: continued sharp reductions in domestic spending. Their approach rules out any discussion of additional revenues and relies heavily on harsh and disproportionate reductions in domestic spending, many of which have been rejected repeatedly by the Congress and the American people.

The President's "Fexible Freeze" for 1990 calls for $21 billion in spending reductions for domestic programs. Defense, in contrast, is fully adjusted for inflation so that on a comparable basis it is untouched. Beneficiaries of entitlement programs such as medicare and civil service retirement would lose ground under the administration's proposals. For example, medical benefits would be reduced $5 billion below the amount under current law and civil service and military retirement benefits would be cut about $3 billion. Many of these elderly beneficiaries have made pension, savings, and retirement decisions based on the assumption that they will continue to receive the benefits now guaranteed in law. Budget reduction strategies that constrain growth below currently projected levels would result in financial difficulties for some recipients particularly if they were applied for an extended period of time. It is very unlikely that a majority of the Democratic or Republican members of the Congress will vote for such disproportionate cuts, especially in light of the budget policies of the last four years.

Third, the administration's budget is a one year plan designed to avoid the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings (G-R-H) sequester: it is not a viable long-term approach to deficit reduction. A proposal that relies on overly optimistic economic assumptions and severe domestic spending cuts may work for one year, but over the long term, is neither theoretically sound nor politically realistic. If it permits the Nation to muddle through this year, it does so with risk and makes the problem for ensuing years even more difficult.

Fourth, while the administration is to be commended for facing up to the long neglected savings and loan problem, its budget does not do so in a creditable way. It shows federally-guaranteed off-budget borrowing as a form of deficit reduction that offsets the true cost of the saving and loan bail-out program. As a result, the administration shows a decline in outlays for the program of $9.2 billion in 1990.

The savings and loan industry represents one of the most serious economic problems facing the nation. We should solve it in the most efficient and least costly manner we can. Such a solution precludes off-budget slight-of-hand, and we should recognize that by showing it on the government's books correctly even if doing so requires a one-time exception to the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit targets.

ECONOMIC ASSUMPTIONS

The NEC is charged with solving the deficit problem. Since it is a long-run problem it must be dealt with using a credible long-term budget plan that in turn must be based on a reasonable set of long-range economic assumptions that do not understate the problem. Optimism is no substitute for responsibility.

Economic forecasting is not an exact science, and errors have been made over the past several years on both sides of the equation. However, according to the Congressional Budget Office (CBO), the budget projection contained in the first congressional budget resolution for the fiscal years 1980-87 had an average error in the deficit of about $42 billion for the year ahead. Optimistic economic assumptions were responsible for about $23 billion of this error, adding amounts to the deficit ranging from a low of $1.4 billion in 1981 to a high of $76 billion in 1982.

Considering the track record on economic projections, it makes sense to choose a set of assumptions that are either mid-range or somewhat pessimistic. That is the prudent course to follow. It is not the choice made by the administration. The economic assumptions used for their budget are at best clearly at the optimistic end of the range of current forecasts for the near term and lose total credibility in the long term. The forecast prepared by the nonpartisan CBO, in contrast, matches quite closely the consensus of private forecasters.

If the Republican plan were based on CBO economic and technical assumptions the deficit targets would simply not be met. Table 1 shows that under current CBO assumptions, the administration's plan (excluding asset sales) misses the target by $22 billion in 1990. By 1993, the year of a balanced budget, the plan misses by $81 billion. If the social security trust fund surplus is excluded the shortfalls are $90 billion and $184 billion, respectively.

The "lost savings" from optimistic economic assumptions, which total $173 billion over the four year period, further delay our goal of a balanced unified budget by 1993.

UNSUSTAINABLE DOMESTIC REDUCTIONS

The administration has made a major point of the fact that if the economy maintains its strong upward growth trend budget receipts will naturally increase by $82 billion in 1990. This, they claim, is enough to reduce the deficit by the $63 billion necessary to meet the G-R-H deficit target with $19 billion left for program "increases". However, the natural growth of $82 billion includes an increase of almost $30 billion in social security contributions and other earmarked taxes.

This argument would make sense if the economy that produced the $82 billion were not changing in other ways. First, about $50 billion of that is the result of inflation—that part of economic growth represented by price changes, not real new economic activity. This same inflation affects federal buying power and the value of federal payments for entitlement programs such as social security and programs for the poor. Furthermore, like it or not, the population of the U.S. is aging, so costs for social security and medicare go up whether or not there is inflation. And, because of past deficits, interest costs continue to rise. In fact, social security, interest, and programs for the poor, all of which are programs even the administration admits should not be cut, use up $6 billion more than the $19 billion available. Other legal commitments—including medicare—require an additional $18 billion. That leaves the rest of the budget without any adjustment for inflation or funds for new initiatives.

As impractical as this is for the next year's budget, it is devastating for the longer range. Absorbing inflation for five years in a row requires programs cuts of at least 14 percent in discretionary programs and even more if the inflation level moves above the optimistic projections of the administration. Transportation, education, environmental and law enforcment activities are a few examples of programs that would be scaled back under such a proposal. Federal domestic discretionary spending has already borne the brunt of budgetary restraint in the 1980s, declining from almost 6 percent of gross national product (GNP) at the start of the decade to less than 4 percent at present. Under this plan, domestic discretionary spending would fall to about 3 percent of GNP by 1993. We see no evidence that the American people—nor, on a bipartisan basis, the Congress—are willing to support such a reduction. In fact, as the President has so effectively stated in his February 9 State of the Union message, the need for additional resources has accelerated in recent years, particularly in the areas of education, housing, environmental programs, drugs, space and science, research and development, day care, child adoption, and health care—in order to produce a kinder and gentler America.

Apparently the administration thinks nobody notices what is going on in our country. But they do. Asking the American people to accept the logic of the administration's budget is like expecting a family to deal with inflation and support a newly retired parent without any increase in wages. It may be possible, but surely no one would expect that it would go by unnoticed or that it could be done without some sacrifice by members of the family.

THE NEED FOR VISION

Over the next decade we face both opportunities and risks. We have the opportunity to use this period of economic growth and stability to move toward a budgetary surplus, increase our national savings rate, channel these savings into productive investment, and guarantee a rising standard-of-living for future generations. We face the risks of continued large budget deficits and huge trade deficits that perpetuate our extremely low saving rate and threaten the Nation's long-term prospect for strong economic growth.

We need to provide for an adequate defense and to invest in our domestic economy, but we also have responsibility to pay the bills. In 1981 the nation made what the Republican Senate Majority Leader at the time called "a riverboat gamble." We lost. The "new economics" did not work out. Reduced tax rates did not bring about increased revenues. Still there was a theory, indeed a new and legitimate school of economic thought. If it was wrong-headed, it was not weak-minded. Today, however, on the basis neither of theory nor evidence, we are asked to believe that the deficits will go away on their own like some friendly monster in a Disney cartoon.

The people of this Nation can be trusted. Tell them the truth and make clear the alternatives—with the rewards and penalties for the country that each involves—and they will make responsible choices.

We are confident that the Congress and the American people will support the President in the kind of meaningful and realistic long-run deficit reduction program that will leave our children a legacy of fiscal responsibility and assure that the Nation maintains its position as the economic leader of the free world as we move towards the twenty-first century.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I would record, Mr. President, the report was cordially received by the administration but no action of any kind was ever taken. The commissioners were never asked to report to the President. We were never asked to even report to his financial officers. The thought that this would go away was pernicious and devastating and indeed the title of our summation is called, the risks of wishful thinking.

I say once again the then majority leader, now President pro tempore, has taken us so beautifully through the history of this institution, and the Constitution begins in the context of a crisis of the credit of the United States, a crisis in what Hamilton, our first Secretary of the Treasury, called political arithmetic. Until we get that right, everything else will go wrong.

Mr. President, that is about what is happening in this Nation in consequence of the last decade.

I very much thank the distinguished—I dare not say venerable, it sounds like it might refer to too ancient a circumstance, I say simply, honored beyond the equal of any Member of this floor—the distinguished President pro tempore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair, and I thank my friend from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] for the very able work and great amount of time that he and other Commission members put in on the occasion to which he addressed his remarks, into the formulation of the report, which was an excellent report. And, as he has stated, it is to be regretted that little, if any, use has been made of it since.

But, hopefully, it can still shed light, Mr. President, on the problem which has grown only worse since the time of the filing of the report.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the distinguished President pro tempore yield.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, I will be happy to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FORD). The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. On behalf of those of us who may have amendments to offer, I would request, if it is possible, that we might recess rather than charging this time against the bill with the understanding we would yield back the time if it is not later needed. I understand there is a very great possibility now that there is an agreement coming forth from the majority-minority leaders' office that the Senate will support and there will be no necessity for time to offer amendments. But if that does not materialize, for some reason it is frustrated, it is my understanding now there is about 7½ hours remaining on the bill. Am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Approximately 7 hours remain.

Mr. STEVENS. I have great respect for the leadership and I do not wish to make such motion myself, but I do make the request that we consider recessing and not charging this time further against this bill to see if we can work it out without having the possibility that we would come back to the floor with very little time remaining and have a number of Senators who wish to have amendments considered if the projected compromise is not achieved.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am advised that the distinguished majority leader would like for the Senate to stand in recess but with the time equally charged against both sides. Is the distinguished Senator from Alaska amenable to such a request?

Mr. STEVENS. No, Mr. President, this Senator is not amenable to that. I regret that. If the time is continued to be charged, I would like to have the bill before the Senate and I would like to offer some amendments.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

Mr. President, I fully understand his desire to offer amendments and therefore in view of the fact that the majority leader does wish to have a recess not charged, I have no alternative but to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am entirely in agreement to let that be charged against both sides if the Senator would like to have that done. The time is roughly equal but I will get my material and come back.

Mr. BYRD. Yes. I ask unanimous consent that the time be charged against both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until 2 p.m., and that at 2 p.m. when the Senate resumes consideration of the reconciliation bill there be deemed to be 5½ hours remaining on that bill, that time to be equally divided to each side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I forgot to ask the majority leader, I do not want to delay anything. I wonder if he will add to that before we go on recess that I can have 2 minutes to explain my absence from the Senate yesterday?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from New Mexico be recognized to address the Senate for such time as he may wish to use, and that upon the completion of his remarks the Senate stand in recess until 2 p.m. under the conditions previously stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from New Mexico, Senator DOMENICI, is recognized.

ABSENCE FROM THE SENATE SESSION

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, actually I have a great deal of remorse about not being in the Senate yesterday because it was a sad day for my family, and my wife, Nancy Burk. Her father, 85-year-old William Lee Burk, died 3 days before. So I was in New Mexico, and I remained there to be with the family for his funeral.

I might, while I am addressing the Senate, say that I consider it a real privilege to have married into that family. This distinguished gentleman is sort of a self-made man, raised a beautiful family, worked hard all his life, and, as one of his grandchildren said yesterday, he was the epitome of a true American. He would have been thrilled, as one of them said at the funeral ceremony, to see people in the world looking for what America has.

So I do not normally miss Senate sessions, certainly not when it is debating budget issues.

I returned last night, and I will continue hopefully today to see if we cannot together resolve this very serious problem we have on the reconciliation bill.

I thank the Senate for giving me a few moments to discuss my absence.

RECESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico yields the floor.

Under the previous order, the Senate stands in recess until the hour of 2 o'clock this afternoon.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 12:14 p.m., recessed until 2 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the PRESIDENT pro tempore.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that I speak out of order; that all time I consume be charged to this side of the aisle.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How much time does the Senator desire?

Mr. PRYOR. The Senator from Arkansas will speak no longer than 5 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE $2 MILLION PRESIDENTIAL REVOLVING DOOR

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, when Ronald Reagan left the White House 9 months ago, he became the immediate beneficiary of a Federal largesse bestowed upon former Presidents. Three decades ago, out of concern over the welfare of our former Chief Executives, Congress acted to avoid commercialization of the Office of the President of the United States. In recognition of their unique status as elder statesmen, a law was passed that provided Herbert Hoover, Harry Truman, and their successors a pension and an office allowance. Subsequent legislation gave the Nation's former Presidents funding for libraries to house the papers of their Presidency, free mailing privileges, and Secret Service protection. In many regards, such benefits can be viewed as an expression of gratitude on the part of the American people for their years serving this Nation in the capacity of President of the United States.

For several years now, a number of us in the Congress have been concerned that the somewhat beleaguered taxpayer is being asked to contribute too much to support former Presidents. Some moderate adjustments have been made to the law to alleviate those concerns. For example, starting with President Bush, the friends and associates of a former President who raise money to build a Presidential library will also have to establish an endowment to cover the heretofore taxpayer-borne cost of maintaining such a facility. I have long thought that some additional modifications were in order. After reading the May 11 New York Times column by William Safire and an article in the Washington Post this past Saturday, I am convinced that reconsideration of the benefits we bestow on former Presidents is particularly well recommended.

These two articles, which I will ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD immediately following my statement, pertain to the trip former President Reagan will be taking to Japan in 2 weeks. The trip, which may have been arranged by former USIA Director Charles Wick while he and President Reagan were still in office, will net the former President $2 million for two 20 minute speeches. Another apparent beneficiary will be the Reagan Presidential library, which will reportedly receive a gift of $2 million from the Government of Japan, to be used as the former President sees fit. This, by the way, is the very same library that then President Reagan insisted be exempt from the law requiring a private maintenance endowment—thereby leaving the taxpayer to pay the estimated million-dollar annual operating cost for his library.

So, here we have a trip to Japan that will enrich former President Reagan and his library to the tune of $2 million each. And what will the taxpayers get out of Mr. Reagan's trip to Japan. They will get the tab for his Secret Service protection. And, I might add, I hope that protection is more than adequate to protect this fine gentleman. I cannot help wondering whether this is proper for the American taxpayer to foot the bill for this trip to Japan for the former President when he will be making two 20-minute speeches and receiving a speaker's fee of $2 million. We owe our former Presidents protection and respect, but do we owe them a guarantee to underwrite whatever future business ventures they may undertake for personal gain?

My staff was unable to learn the precise cost of the additional overseas protection because the Secret Service claimed such information was not readily available. However, I can tell you the tab for protecting our former Presidents has risen $3.8 million in the last year to a estimated total cost of $12.1 million in fiscal year 1990.

Should Ronald Reagan reimburse the American taxpayer or otherwise offset the expense for Secret Service protection while in Japan making $2 million? He is not required to do so. Moreover, given that he insisted his library be exempt from the endowment law and his failure to respond to my request that he voluntarily comply with this law, I doubt he will do so. But, the case is certainly worth considering. And the issue and the question remains.

Another world-traveling former President, Richard Nixon decided a few years ago to provide for his own security services. Perhaps there is an equitable middle ground between the Reagan and Nixon situations regarding public funding of protective services for former Presidents when they are traveling on profitmaking ventures. I plan to discuss this matter with the Secret Service in the near future. If some administrative accommodation cannot be reached on this matter, I will introduce legislation to make sure the taxpayer does not get stuck with the bill when our former Presidents are off actually increasing their personal fortunes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an essay in the New York Times of May 11, 1989, and also an article written by Mr. Safire, also an article in the Washington Post of October 7, 1989, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RECRUITING REAGAN

(By William Safire)

The payoff scandal that toppled a Japanese Prime Minister is now reaching out to entangle a former U.S. President.

The hiring of Ronald Reagan by Japanese businessmen to serve as their glad-hander and front man for a festive week in Tokyo—within one year of his leaving office—strikes the nostrils with the force of week-old sushi.

We learn from Steven Weisman, Tokyo bureau chief of The New York Times, that before the Recruit scandal exposed the corruption between Japanese corporations and politicians, the Fujisankei Communications Group hired Ronald Reagan for two speeches and assorted ceremonies in October.

I am told the fee to Mr. Reagan will be 270,000,000 yen, or about $2 million; this one week's work is more than he earned during eight years in the White House.

The two jobs, however—as U.S. President and as master of ceremonies at the "Premium Imperiale of the Arts" in Japan—are not unconnected. President Reagan, in 1983, favored the founder of the Fujisankei conglomerate by agreeing to an exclusive interview in one of his newspapers, and in 1988 brought him into the Oval Office to discuss the possibility of the visit that turned out to be so lucrative.

Who was President Reagan's agent in this deal? None other than Charles Wick, his California crony who was head of the United States Information Agency. In October 1988, on one of his last overseas flings at taxpayer expense, Charlie listened to an offer in Tokyo from Hiroaki Shikanai, son of the executive who had already sounded out the President in the White House. In February of this year, Mr. Wick closed the deal on private citizen Reagan's behalf.

However, Fujisankei (a competitor of Recruit Company, and a hefty contributor to the Reagan Library) was not the only Japanese corporate bidder for the Reagan services. Shuwa Corporation, with extensive real estate holdings in major U.S. cities, reportedly offered $5 million. "I did not regard that as a serious offer," Mr. Wick told The Times. He insisted "there were no serious discussions or negotiations with anybody else."

Note the qualifying word serious. I suspect that was Mr. Wick admitting, artfully, that such discussions or negotiations did take place, but he chooses to characterize them as trivial, or not serious. If Mr. Wick seriously discussed such an offer while holding public office, he would be in deep trouble, as would Mr. Reagan.

Was this deal hastily changed after the exposure of corruption of officialdom by wealthy corporations like Recruit? Apparently so; former Prime Minister Nakasone and friends were supposed to be central in the Reagan visitation; now he is burdened with allegations and is out of the Reagan deal completely.

Did Charlie Wick get a commission on the deal he agented? (He's entitled to at least 27 million yen.) Not to my knowledge; however, Mr. Reagan or his friends are apparently leaning on President Bush to have his agent appointed U.S. Commissioner General of the 1992 Seville Exposition. This final favor would put Mr. Wick in charge of a quasi-commercial operation costing taxpayers $15 million.

What's wrong with all this? Certainly the breaking of the million-dollar barrier is joyful news for all of us who speak for fees; why can't a buddy arrange for his old boss to get a bundle?

First, the Attorney General here, as well as law officers in Japan, will want to see what sort of private negotiations may have been held while Mr. Reagan and his agent were in office. Then Congress will want to look into circumstances around the award of the Seville plum.

Let's assume Charlie was careful to put the Japanese on ice until he could lawfully close the deal. And let us grant our former leaders the right to make money in great fistfuls, especially in memoirs—it's a free country, and they are private citizens.

But there is such a thing as seemliness, decorum, respect for high office once held. In Japan, lining the pockets of officials was a way of fast-track corporate life; just as the Japanese are setting themselves right, no former American President should set them an example of how to use an artistic front to take down a few hundred million yen.

If this foreign revolving-door ripoff is right, then what would be wrong with a Return Address at Bitburg, for a million marks, or the dedication of the Gorbachev Glasnost Center for a million rubles? For a former President with a hot agent and no sense of sleaze, the profit opportunities are endless.

MUTTERING IN TOKYO OVER REAGANS' TOUR—EX-PRESIDENT BEING PAID $2 MILLION BY MEDIA GIANT

(By Fred Hiatt)

TOKYO, October 6.—The chartered Boeing 747 has been refurbished with bedroom and shower for the trans-Pacific trip. Perry Como has been booked for an evening's entertainment. In the "R-Project" was room, busy staffers have equipped themselves with "The White House Cookbook" and videotapes of "Santa Fe Trail" and "Bedtime for Bonzo."

Ronald and Nancy Reagan are coming to town, and all of Tokyo—or at least the Fujisankei Communications Group, which is paying an estimated $7 million for their visit—is excited. Radio and television stations owned by Fujisankei are airing commercials about the Oct. 20-28 trip, and dozens of subway and train stations display posters of the former First Couple and the message, "This fall, the Reagans will come with smiles from America."

Not all is smiles in the planning of the extravaganza, however. Despite Fujisankei's generosity—Reagan will deliver two 20-minute speeches during his week here and receive approximately $2 million—Reagan's aides are miffed that the Japanese company is not doing more to help some American relatives of Japan-based soldiers who will be hitching a ride on the chartered jet, according to officials here.

And the Japanese government, a co-host of the Reagan visit, is miffed that Reagan won't hold a news conference and otherwise be more active during the official two-day state visit part of his tour.

"It seems almost that Reagan wants to take a rest during the government portion," one Japanese official said. "In theory, it's a joint invitation by the government and Fujisankei. But in financial terms, it's all Fujisankei, and the government cannot spend so luxuriously."

The government is, however, considering donating $2 million to the Reagan Presidential Library Foundation while Reagan is here.

Fujisankei is Japan's largest media company, with television and radio stations, a national newspaper and dozens of other properties, including a recently purchased 25 percent stake in Britain's Virgin Records. As part of its contract with the Reagans, Fuji's television network will conduct exclusive interviews with both Ronald and Nancy Reagan, as well as featuring a documentary on the former president's life and trip on the day Reagan leaves Japan.

Fujisankei officials said 10 billion yen ($7.1 million) is a very rough estimate of their costs for the trip, not counting the salaries of two dozen staffers working full-time on its preparation. But they said they are motivated by concern for U.S.-Japanese relations, not desire for corporate glory. Group chairman Nobutaka Shikanai is of Reagan's age and conservative bent and reportedly views the former president as a true hero of U.S.-Japanese relations and a friend of Japan.

"The U.S.-Japan relationship is becoming more and more emotional," said Takehiro Kiyohara, an organizer of the "R-Project" at Fujisankei. "It means a lot that the Great Communicator would come . . . and talk directly to the Japanese people."

To further that purpose, the media company is sparing no expense. The Reagans will travel with a retinue of about 20, not including Secret Service agents, according to U.S. officials. Charles Z. Wick, a Reagan friend and former U.S. Information Agency director who helped negotiate the contract with Fujisankei, is scheduled to come with his wife, as are Nancy Reagan's hairdresser, Julius Bengtsson, and Reagan's chief of staff, Frederick J. Ryan, and his wife.

Fujisankei agreed to rent a TWA 747 for the group so that the Reagans could make the trip nonstop and in comfort, officials said. Once they arrive in Tokyo, the couple will be flown by helicopter to Fujisankei's open-air sculpture museum near Mount Fuji.

There, the Reagans will spend their first weekend resting in an official guest house that is being refurbished for them. The redecoration, which cost more than $140,000, includes an elevator, new wallpaper and an extra-large bathtub into which hot-spring water will be piped.

The rest of Reagan's official schedule consists of appearances at several meals, concerts and award ceremonies. "We heard he's not very much interested in tourism or sightseeing," a Fujisankei official said.

During the two days of his state visit, the Reagans will lunch with the emperor and empress, and will attend a large dinner given by Prime Minister Toshiki Kaifu, a lunch cohosted by former prime ministers Yasuhiro Nakasone and Noboru Takeshita and a dinner given by U.S. Ambassador Michael Armacost.

Japanese officials, who warmly remember Reagan's free-trade rhetoric and friendship for Japan, also wanted the former president to hold a news conference and perhaps meet the public in other ways. But Reagan aides said no.

Returned to the embrace of Fujisankei, Reagan will give two speeches, one on politics and one on economics, at luncheons arranged by welcoming committees composed of luminaries of Japanese business and society, including Sony Corp. chairman Akio Morita and fashion designer Hanae Mori.

He will attend a Friendship Concert featuring Perry Como, Placido Domingo, the Harlem Boys Choir and several Japanese stars at a new 17,000-seat arena. The most expensive tickets cost more than $100 (Domingo is charging $680 for tickets to separate dinner-concert here) and proceeds will be donated to the Reagan library.

Finally, Reagan will give brief congratulatory remarks at the first annual Praemium Imperiale award ceremony, which Fujisankei has underwritten. The prizes, for lifetime excellence in the arts, carry a cash award of $100,000, and Fujisankei hopes they will eventually carry the prestige of a Nobel.

One reason Fujisankei is relucant to reveal the exact fee it will pay Reagan, in fact, is that it is paying less to several other world leaders who helped judge the prizes, including former prime ministers Edward Heath of Britain and Amintore Fanfani of Italy, both of whom also are to attend the ceremony.

Sources here and in the United States confirmed that Reagan will receive about $2 million for the trip. But Japanese sources said that some of the funds will go to the Reagan library and not to Reagan personally.

Reagan spokesman Mark Weinberg said that money was "no motivation" in the Reagans' decision to come to Japan. "They have a very high regard for the people of Japan and very warm memories of their previous visits here," Weinberg said.

Meanwhile, the Reagan team finds itself in a small tiff about the 200 family members who have been invited to fly along and visit U.S. service members stationed here. The Reagans will arrive in Tokyo and leave from Osaka, but TWA cannot carry the dependents on what would essentially be a domestic flight between the two cities.

Japan's Transport Ministry has not been eager to waive its rules, and Fujisankei, perhaps feeling it has anted up enough, said the family members are not its problem.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

OMNIBUS BUDGET RECONCILIATION ACT

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUND

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, in a moment I am going to send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be printed in the RECORD. I do not choose to offer it at this time, but I want it to appear in the RECORD so that people can see specifically the issue that I am going to refer to.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, add the following:

SEC. 6. TREATMENT OF INTEREST PAYMENTS FROM THE GENERAL FUND.

Section 201(f) of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting "and shall be treated as outlays from the General Fund of the Treasury" before the period.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I am not going to offer this amendment to the reconciliation bill which is before us, for the simple reason that I anticipate that the Senate will agree sometime later this afternoon to substantially strip virtually all, if not all, of the so-called extraneous provisions from the reconciliation bill now on the floor.

If we had not agreed to this procedure, I might well be offering this as an amendment to the reconciliation bill, because it deals with the very fundamental issue that reconciliation is supposed to deal with; namely, reducing the Federal budget deficit. And unless we do a better job of reducing that deficit than we now do, we will see subsequent Senates and Congresses reaching well into the year 2000, I fear, going through exercise after exercise, bringing reconciliation bills to the floor that do not reconcile very much, and which have the effect of pretending to reduce the budget deficit when they do very little, or even the opposite.

Yesterday, Mr. President, I came here to the Senate floor to introduce legislation, the Social Security Truth in Budgeting Act. I described that legislation rather briefly then, and the bill that I introduced yesterday, as I say, is the sum and substance of this legislation.

I come back to the floor today because I think this issue is still relevant, even if we are not going to adopt any amendments other than a motion to strip this bill, because this issue is one we must deal with this month or, at least if not this month, in the context of any debt ceiling legislation that is going to come before the Senate. It is this Senator's view that unless this Senate acts to take the Social Security trust fund off budget and adjust the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings procedure, as required, to take account of that, there is no way that a debt ceiling bill can possibly, even remotely, stand a chance of passing in this body.

Many of my colleagues to whom I have talked feel very strongly about this issue and who I believe would subscribe to that very comment, which I think speaks for itself.

What I also noted on the wire earlier today is that a number of our colleagues, most of the Members of the Democratic leadership, including the Speaker of the House, held a press conference to talk about honest budgeting and the Social Security trust fund—very much the same subject that I addressed here on the floor yesterday.

I gather that the substance of the press conference this morning was to endorse legislation to take the trust fund out of the deficit game, and I salute that. I think that resolve speaks to my belief that the truth is not a partisan issue, and as elected officials all of us have a collective responsibility to tell the American people the truth, the whole truth, nothing but the truth, irrespective of party, and that includes the truth about the state of the national deficit.

So, Mr. President, I think our House and Senate colleagues hit the nail on the head this morning: The Congress cannot continue to operate a Federal budget out of the payroll taxes of workers which are supposed to be dedicated to their retirement someday.

We cannot claim a victory over debt by continuing to sweep spending excesses under a rug of trust fund surpluses. Democrat or Republican, we must not place the financial security of millions of retirees on the chopping block of our own deceptive accounting books.

The amendment that I asked to be printed in the RECORD at the beginning of these remarks makes it perfectly clear that using surplus funds from the Social Security Program to reduce the deficit is not just a bad budget policy, it is a dishonest budget policy, and worse, it is bad for America.

There are three very brief reasons why I think we should all feel a sense of urgency about this.

First, the game of deficit deception, if continued, is going to make us look like fools. We will get to 1993 when the deficit is supposed to be zero, and assuming we continue to meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets—it would be a first if we did in actuality, but let us pretend for the moment that we actually do—we will find that it is not zero, but actually $100 billion and growing. We will have a deficit because we are spending money that is pledged to the Social Security trust fund. The trust fund will be charging us interest, and we will have a very tough time explaining how on one day we were dressed in our fine balance-the-budget clothes, and the very next day we are stripped naked, having to admit we have at least a $100 billion problem.

Mr. President, the Senate and the Congress should not put themselves in that position. We need to act now. We need to act this year. We need to act this month.

The second reason we need to act is that we have an obligation to the people who both pay in and who take out of the Social Security trust funds. We obviously have an obligation to present retirees, but the people who pay in today are the retirees of tomorrow, and if we continue to spend the Social Security revenues in excess of expenditures, we are going to find that we do not have the money to pay today's workers in retirement because we have already borrowed and spent the money.

Let me give you a number that ought to shock everyone in this Chamber. As we know, the bulk of the baby-boom generation, those people roughly age 35 to 43, are going to be reaching retirement age around the year 2020. According to the intermediate U.S. projections from the 1989 Social Security Board of Trustees report, the balance in the old age and survivors disability income [OASDI] trust fund will be $9.6 trillion in current dollars.

If we continue our current policy of borrowing that money and spending it, the general fund of the Treasury is going to owe that $9.6 trillion back to the Social Security trust fund.

Mr. President, where are we going to get that money? We think that $200 billion is a pretty big problem around here. As a matter of fact, we have real problems reducing the size of the deficit by $25 billion or $30 billion. So where are we going to get $9.6 trillion as that debt comes due?

There are only three places we could go to get it. We either slash Social Security benefits down to almost nothing, or hike taxes up through the roof, or we borrow on a scale literally unimagined and I think unimaginable.

The National Economic Commission in it's spring report did not agree on much. But it did agree that we should stop the current practice of borrowing and spending the Social Security surpluses each year. Commission members understood that having saved the Social Security goose 5 years ago, it is the most irresponsible of policies to melt down that golden trust fund egg today.

The third reason why this legislation is appropriate to any discussion of deficit reduction is what I call the issue of interest. Mr. President, the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings procedure that drives reconciliation is a commitment to reduce Government borrowing and simultaneously reduced interest paid on Government debt.

Our current use of Social Security reserves simply replaces one form of borrowing with another. Thus instead of reducing the interest burden on the Government, we are adding to it.

Let me give you a number or two. In 1989, the interest on the national debt was 169 billion, 8 percent of which went to pay interest on our clandestine borrowing from the trust fund. If we continue to spend the Social Security surplus to mask the Federal deficit by the year 2000, over 41 percent of the total interest owed by the Federal Government on our national debt will go directly to cover trust fund borrowing money we use to run general Government, will be required to cover the interest due.

I know a lot of our colleagues may say, "Well, I am not going to be here in this Chamber in the year 2000; why should I worry, why should I care?"

Well, Mr. President, we have had plans for the last 8 years to reduce the deficit, and here we are with a huge one, the reason for this reconciliation bill.

What I can tell you is that the amount of interest we now pay out is crippling our ability to meet the responsibilities of general Government today, and when it begins to eat further into the dollar, as it will within the decade, there will be even less to invest to meet the responsibilities of general Government.

And what are those responsibilities? They are the investments we make each year in such vital priority areas as education, training, health care, the war on drugs that we just undertook, the readiness of our Armed Forces.

Mr. President, what happens to a dollar committed to interest payments? If it is going to the public, it is going to some big financial institution or wealthy investor. If it is going into the Social Security trust fund, it is going in to make up the actuarial surplus that we need.

But I can tell you this, irrespective of where it goes, it is a dollar that is never going to help educate a single child, or train a dislocated worker, or help find a cure for AIDS or cancer.

I think it is critical to note that the Social Security Truth in Budgeting Act, the amendment and the bill that I have been talking about, requires that interest paid to the Social Security trust fund be shown in our Federal budget in the same fashion as other interest, and when we do that, I think we are going to be in for a big surprise.

Mr. President, there are some people who will say, "Well, look, we have had a unified budget ever since roughly 1968 when Lyndon Johnson put the Social Security trust funds on budget, which had the effect of making the Vietnam war look a lot less costly." They will say, "You do not need to do this. It is not going to make any difference. We have been doing this for 20 years."

To someone who says that, I would say two things. First, look at where we are today. It is not a very pretty picture. We are going to be on the threshold of having to pass a permanent extension of the debt ceiling bill at a level in excess of $3 trillion, $2 trillion of that added in the last 9 years.

But, by the same token, let us look at the benefits of what I propose. The extraordinary benefit is that we would be able, by no later than the year 2007, to literally buy in all the publicly held national debt; whether it is held in Omaha or Osaka, we will be able to buy it all in. That is to say that $3 trillion that is out there today will be retired. We will have done something that we all talk about, which is to get rid of that burden on our children.

How is it going to affect us? I assume we will be if not in the Senate, at least active in our communities. What is going to happen, Mr. President, is that the Treasury will be playing a smaller and smaller role, starting at once, in going into the marketplace as they do every week to add to and to refinance the existing national debt and, by about 17 years from now, the Treasury would literally be not competing at all with the private sector in borrowing increasing amounts both at home and abroad.

In other words, the financial operation of the Federal Government would no longer be driving up interest rates and with interest rates, the cost for borrowing on a house, an automobile, starting or expanding a business. You do not have to be an economist to know that when interest rates drop dramatically, the cost of capital, the cost of borrowing, drops dramatically, and instead of being locked in, therefore, to refinancing an ever-increasing burden of Government debt, we would create a vast pool of savings, a trillion dollars literally, and those moneys would be free for investment in job creation and industry. And this is a tenet with which virtually every economist I have talked to, and those who have written articles on this subject, agrees. The United States under these circumstances would be able to enjoy a literally unparalleled period of prosperity.

Mr. President, this is not the first time I have taken the floor to discuss this legislation. I was pleased that, on May 3 of this year, the Senate passed a resolution which I introduced—it was cosponsored by the senior Senator from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, and by Senator HATCH, from Utah—the sense of which was that it was time for us this year to restore truth and accuracy to the budget process by removing the Social Security trust funds from our budget calculations.

I offered, in support of that resolution at that time, the findings of the National Economic Commission. As I said, the National Economic Commission disagreed on almost everything, but the one thing they agreed upon is that the Social Security trust fund should be removed from the annual Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction game.

So the amendment that I have offered today will remove the Social Security trust fund from the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings calculation immediately. It will halt the use of the OASDI trust fund from being used to disguise the size of our national debt.

How does it do it? Mr. President, I have no particular pride of authorship, and I have talked to many of our colleagues on this subject. I have talked on our side of the aisle to Senators GRAMM and RUDMAN and to Senator DOMENICI; and on the other side of the aisle to Senators MOYNIHAN and HOLLINGS. Although I have had my own ideas, and these track fairly closely with legislation I introduced last year, nonetheless, I think it is fair to say what I am about to describe represents a consensus as to what the Senate ought to do. I think that consensus is reflected in the legislation that I sent to the desk by doing the following four things.

First, after taking the OASDI trust fund off budget, the first thing we do is to adjust the current Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets upward by an amount exactly equal to the Congressional Budget Office's estimates of the OASDI surpluses for fiscal years 1991, 1992, and 1993. What that means is that there would be no additional fiscal impact on us in those fiscal years through 1993. In other words, although we are changing the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target, we here in Congress will not have to cut any additional spending or raise any additional revenues than we would otherwise have to.

The second element is that we are going to extend the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets 4 additional years, through fiscal 1997, from 1993 to 1997. During that period, we will continue to reduce the actual deficit, which in fiscal 1993 would be roughly $100 or $99 billion, by approximately $25 billion a year; going 100, 75, 50, 25, until it is zero in fiscal year 1997.

Third, once the OASDI trust funds are taken off the budget, it is important that they be fully protected. Therefore, the proposal of the Heinz amendment, the Social Security Truth in Budgeting Act, would retain the equivalent Gramm-Rudman-Hollings 60-vote point of order before any legislation could be considered to use any of the Social Security surplus funds for any other purpose than that of current law. By the way, that current law clearly includes continuing annual cost of living increases.

Finally, this legislation specifies that all payments to the OASDI trust fund from general revenues, including interest, will be reported as they always should have been as outlays in the budget of the United States.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues' support for a plan or a plan substantially like this that would ensure future retirees' benefits. Every day we postpone removing the trust fund, the more difficult and intimidating the task will become.

The day of reckoning for honest budgeting, in this Senator's view, cannot be postponed for future Congresses or future generations. The day that we should take this action is today or, if not today, very shortly after today. I ask my colleagues to carefully consider this proposal as a pledge to honest budgeting and ultimately the healthiest of economies that we would ever come to know.

Mr. President, since I have not offered this as an amendment, I do not need to withdraw it, but I do urge all my colleagues to examine it and to give me their thoughts and suggestions on how to improve it, if possible, and to join with me in making sure that calendar year 1990 and preferably the month of October 1989 is the year that we meet the confidence that our retirees and our workers who will be retirees had placed in us to do the right thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I ask permission that I be able to speak as in morning business and that the time be charged to our side.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, this is my first time through the budget process. I do not have the institutional memory of many of my colleagues on budget matters, although I have listened with interest to many of their horror stories. And I am certainly not an expert. In fact, I would say that in many regards I am speaking as an objective observer when I say that this is one of the biggest challenges I have ever seen.

I do not mean that as an insult to my colleagues who have been here a lot longer than I, and who have tried to obtain true deficit reduction. I know it is not easy, and I commend those who worked over the weekend to come up with a solution to this year's problems.

But before I address the pending reconciliation bill, I want to speak for a couple of minutes about certain aspects of the budget process prior to this point which make no sense to me, or—I would venture to say—most of the American people.

As a good mainstream Republican, I have often stated that true deficit reduction can only occur if we reduce Federal spending. I truly believe that. However, my first lesson in congressional budgeting came when the President's budget was first presented. At that time, I learned that the standard by which Congress measures which programs are cut and which ones receive increases is called the "current services" baseline. This standard assumes a 6-percent spending increase in every Federal program this year. How we will ever truly cut spending using this method escapes me. That is why I cosponsored the Commonsense Budget Act of 1989 authored by my good friend, Senator BOSCHWITZ. This legislation would require the President and Congress to compare budget numbers to what we actually spent the prior year. If that legislation was included in this reconciliation bill, then I would definitely vote for it.

My second budget lesson occurred when the Commerce Committee, of which I am a member, was considering its title of this massive reconciliation bill. We were presented with a number of options prepared by the committee staff, and as I looked over them I noticed that there were no spending cut recommended. They were all user fees or revenue raisers. Now, I thought, by the very definition of reconciliation, that committees were directed to "report legislation by a certain date that decreases spending or increases revenues." However, when a number of my colleagues and I raised the possibility of cutting spending, we were told that we could not do so—that cuts would not be scored or counted in our committee work on reconciliation. The logic of that still escapes me, and I intend to look into it further.

Now, to the matter at hand—this 1,316-page monstrosity. I have listened with interest to the comments made by Senators ARMSTRONG, HATCH, GRAMM, and others regarding the extraneous provisions in this bill. I have heard the chairman of the Budget Committee say that the provisions that truly address the budget deficit only make up approximately 100 pages of this bill. I say let's consider that 100-page bill. I'm sure that it is not perfect, but at this point it is at least manageable.

I can join many of my colleagues in saying that there are many provisions in this bill which I would like to see enacted. A number of bills which I have previously cosponsored, and urged the Senate to adopt on a number of occasions are incorporated in this bill. The repeal of section 89 of the IRS Code comes immediately to mind.

The Finance Committee also included a number of important rural health initiatives which I strongly support. These include the elimination of the urban-rural differential in Medicare reimbursement that currently exists. This is the essence of a bill, introduced by Senators BENTSEN and DOLE, of which I am a cosponsor. The classification of certain hospitals as regional referral centers would be continued for 3 years. This is the essence of a bill which I cosponsored with Senator MCCLURE. There are many other important initiatives as well.

There are also a number of provisions in this bill which I would hope are never enacted.

So I believe that in the name of fairness, and to restore some of this body's credibility on fiscal matters, we must strip all the extraneous provisions and just deal with the deficit reduction matters. I will support my colleagues in upholding the Byrd rule, and I will support my colleagues who want to go further.

Finally, I would still have serious reservations about even adopting a stripped-down version of this bill. I reserved judgment in May when we passed the fiscal year 1990 budget resolution on the $5.3 billion in revenues to be raised by the Finance Committee. I would say now that a number of the revenue provisions in this bill are questionable at best.

For example, there are a number of quick fixes which raise revenues this fiscal year by simply accelerating collections. This approach, for the most part, is a one-time benefit to Government, but a long-term cost in additional paperwork for the taxpayer. These include: Changing collection of gasoline excise from semimonthly to weekly deposits, speeding up payroll tax deposits, and requiring estimated tax payments on corporate subchapter S income.

The best example of how far we are going with these accounting gimmicks is a provision included in this bill which stretches out the lump-sum annuities of Federal employees retiring next year from a 1-year payment to a 2-year payment. This provision saves $700 million in fiscal year 1990, but increases spending in fiscal year 1991 by $750 million. I do not call that deficit reduction.

Finally, I want to address the question of a capital gains tax cut. I also expressed my hope that this would be included as a part of this deficit reduction package in May. I am tired of hearing people say that the President is willing to trade deficit reduction for capital gains. I want to remind my colleagues that the President sees his capital gains proposal as deficit reduction and I agree.

Far too often we have heard how a reduction in the capital gains tax will benefit only the wealthy. Frankly, I'm confused. We must all be made aware that cutting capital gains increases the total amount of taxes paid by the more affluent. In fact, capital gains taxes paid by the wealthy more than doubled from $8.7 billion in 1979 to $18.4 billion in 1985. Under the Bush-Jenkins plan, revenues would increase by $9.4 billion in the first 3 years.

Now, I don't know about anybody else, but when we can decrease taxes and increase revenues to pay for:

Earned-income tax credits for low-income working families;

R&D tax credits to foster increased spending on research and development; and

Low-income housing credits to encourage the building of low-income housing.

This represents a sound policy—a policy that not only encourages investment but also raises revenues to pay for programs for the less fortunate.

And how about all the cattlemen and ranchers in the State of Montana. Cattlemen in particular, who oftentimes must keep their stock for extended periods of time, are not only adversely affected by a high capital gains tax rate but are further hurt by the fact that no indexing on such gains occurs. Mr. President, the same case can be made for the timber industry as well. As we all know it takes anywhere from 30 to 100 years for one single crop rotation to occur. In other words, if we would harvest and subsequently plant lodgepole pines today, they would not be ready for another 100 years. For the approximately 20,000 private wood lot owners in my State, a reduction in the capital gains tax and, more importantly, the fact it will be indexed for inflation, provides a vital incentive to go forward with the President's "Greening of America" initiative.

I think one of the most important things I have learned since arriving, is that this country must attempt to maintain a consistent policy on taxation. This body seems to be preoccupied with changing the Tax Code, as has occurred in the budget reconciliation package. Now I realize this will be no easy task, but if we are to plan for long-term investments, we cannot continue to change the rules in the middle of the game.

Mr. President, I intend to vote against the budget reconciliation package unless we are able to strip the bill of all extraneous provisions and provide the Senate and the American people with a true deficit reduction package free of budgetary gimmicks.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REFORM IN THE CHICAGO PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, this morning I rise to celebrate a great political victory in Chicago, a triumph of grassroots political democratic action.

It is a triumph with many heroes. They were unwilling to accept the defeat which accompanied the reluctant acceptance of the status quo. These heroes include Designs for Change, Leadership for Quality Education, the American Federation of Teachers, the Parent Teachers Association, and other community and business groups who have demonstrated a willingness to put private capital on the line.

They include Chicago's Mayor Richard Daley whose support and advocacy were crucial. Former Mayor Harold Washington also deserves much credit. They include State representative John Cullerton and Gov. Jim Thompson who were willing to bring the State of Illinois into a city-school district partnership.

It is a triumph born of a faith that parents, teachers, and neighborhood leaders can run our public schools better than a top down, central board. It is a triumph over the entrenched bureaucracy that fought hard against it because they feared the heat of increased, direct accountability. Hundreds of bureaucrats have already been cleaned out from their comfortable jobs, and tenure is no longer a way of life for Chicago's 540 principals.

Mr. President, we have been in politics long enough to appreciate how dramatic this change is. Two days ago the decisions about Chicago's 410,000 public school students were being made by a central board. This morning, the schools of America's third largest school district are in the hands of 3,240 parents, 1,080 neighborhood leaders, and 1,080 teachers.

The intricate political negotiations which produced this radical transformation were extremely difficult and risky. The reformers share the same goals as those of Solidarity leaders who have set Poland on a new and dangerous course. The heroes of Poland and the heroes of Chicago looked at the status quo and found it to be lacking. They both have proposed radical solutions to ordinary problems.

The web of associations and rivalries inside Chicago's many social, economic and political groupings had to be addressed and understood by the valiant crew of committed citizens who have earned this victory. Again I find a parallel in Eastern Europe. In this case it rivals the effect of the factions inside and outside of Hungary's Communist Party as they move to shift toward a market economy and greater political freedoms. In both instances the established and entrenched bureaucrats resisted the changes because their jobs were jeopardized.

Mr. President, it is instructive for us to consider why the heroes in Poland and Hungary are extolled almost daily on the Senate floor while their American counterparts are not. In part it is because we are more skeptical of political action here at home. In part it is because national political leaders—like us—always worry about being challenged by an up and coming local leader. In part it is because we simply do not notice. Mostly, however, it is because we know if we watch too closely we will eventually have to spend some money.

Mr. President, we should not abandon the heroes of Poland and Hungary. Their accomplishments and the excitement of the Eastern European movements deserve our full attention. With the leaders of reform risking so much and with so much of the causes of peace and freedom at stake, now is not the time to be timid in Eastern Europe.

I am not here this morning arguing against helping the freedom fighters of Hungary and Poland. Rather, I am here to argue for the help of freedom fighters here at home in Chicago, IL.

The call to action was given on September 28, 1989, by President Bush at the University of Virginia in Charlottesville:

> I do not counsel a naive nostalgia, some tame adherence to the past. Business as usual is not getting us where we need to go. So when hallowed tradition proves to be hollow convention, then we must shatter tradition. The polls show what every PA board member already knows—the American people are ready for radical reforms. We must not disappoint them.

The people of Chicago have shattered tradition. They have shown they are ready for radical reforms. They are on the threshold of radically restructuring one of the worst school districts in America. Forty percent of Chicago's students drop out of school, and those who graduate perform very poorly on national scores.

If, in the isolation of these Senate Chambers, my colleagues do not feel the tragedy of the current situation in American schools today, listen to the voices of these American business leaders:

"The making of a National disaster," says David T. Kearns, chairman of Xerox Corp.

"A third world within our own country. If we continue to let children who are born in poverty fail to get the kind of education that will allow them to participate in our economy and our society productively, then some time in the 21st century this Nation will cease to be a peaceful, prosperous democracy", says Brad Butler, former chairman of the Procter & Gamble Co.

"The American dream turned nightmare", says James E. Burke, chief executive officer of Johnson & Johnson.

"Even the telephone operator job is now computerized. Directory assistance operators search a huge electronic data base to retrieve and deliver information to customers. Most of our clerical jobs require word processing, computer skills or both. In 1987, fewer than 30 percent of employment candidates met our skill and ability requirements for sales, service, and technical jobs. Only 15 percent scored at the proficient level on our typing test, and almost 50 percent of those tested were not qualified for jobs requiring even light typing. Over all, we estimate that fewer than 1 in 10 applicants meets all our qualifications standards", says John L. Clendenin, chairman of the board of the Bell South Corp.

These American leaders and many others are sounding the alarm. We need to hear the call and respond when our help is needed.

Mr. President, the parents, neighborhood leaders, and teachers who have taken over Chicago's schools need our help. They have found willing partners in the business community, city hall, and State government. Now, they need a Federal partner. For this cannot be seen as another local problem; this must be seen as a national crisis and challenge.

Mr. President, I propose to match the radical response of the people of Chicago with our own brand of radicalism. I propose to create a U.S. Educational Trust Corporation which will be a new Federal tool to renew America's schools.

As I envision it, the Educational Trust Corporation will become a partner with school districts, cities, States, and businesses like those of Chicago who are committed to making desperately needed structural changes. The Educational Trust Corporation will make 20- to 30-year performance-based commitments to help local parents, neighborhood leaders, and teachers.

To provide the Educational Trust Corporation with a source of funds, I would propose to close the loophole in our income taxes that permit very high income Americans to pay 5 percent less in taxes. This "bubble," as it has been called, will generate approximately $5 billion in revenues each year. I would further propose to use the model of Resolution Trust Corporation, which will enable us to bail out our savings and loans to permit the Educational Trust Corporation to sell 50 billion dollars' worth of bonds so that our work can progress more rapidly.

Let me make it clear that I see the Federal role to be limited to two general things the Federal Government does efficiently and very effectively. The first is to collect money. The local property tax base, supplemented with State income, sales, and most recently lottery revenues, simply cannot generate the dollars needed to dramatically improve the quality of people who run our schools and teach our children.

The second thing the Federal Government does well is to leverage higher performance standards. In this case I am proposing a carrot rather than a stick. I am proposing a Federal response to local action rather than a top down coercive Federal move.

This is entirely consistent with the action taken by President Bush and America's Governors to develop national education goals, and with the goals proposed on September 15, 1989, by the Senate Democratic leadership. These goals included early childhood development; basic skills; graduation and literacy rates; math, science, and foreign languages; access to higher education; and teacher shortages.

If the Educational Trust Corporation were in business today, it would already have begun to negotiate with school districts like Chicago. The Corporation would encourage additional changes needed if American children are to become all they were meant to be. The Corporation could do this by negotiating legitimate partnership contracts that required each party—schools, city, State, businesses and Federal Government—to perform according to agreed upon guidelines and standards.

The changes proposed by Chicago are as radical as they are necessary. They will create an environment of enhanced responsibility for teachers, principals, and parents. The potential for dramatic improvement is very great.

One thing has not changed, Mr. President, and cannot be changed by statute: The people who are hired to be the schools' principals and teachers will determine the eventual outcome of Chicago's reforms. The competition for good managers and bright teachers to leave education for higher salaries will only intensify. In short, Mr. President, the people of Chicago will eventually need money if they are to succeed.

In the reporting of the changes taking place in Hungary, an old Transylvanian adage was retold that applies to the school reform in Chicago: "The wolf changes its fur once a year, but it is still a wolf." The nearly 5,400 newly elected school council members and the children in 628 Chicago schools face such a wolf this morning, as they look into an uncertain and promising future.

The people of Chicago should not be left to fight this battle on their own. President Bush is right: Americans feel the time is right to act. Americans are ready, willing, and able to get the job done. What they need is a Federal educational partner who shares their powerful sense of urgency and has the same willingness to risk it all on the future of our children.

I yield the floor. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SIMON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, might I respond to my colleague from Nebraska and commend him for what he has just said. It is interesting that he is commenting on something that happened in the city of Chicago. If my colleague, Senator DIXON, or I were up commending the city of Chicago, you would say it is provincialism on our part, and you would expect it.

I think it is significant that a Senator from Nebraska is today commenting on what has happened in the city of Chicago and saying this is exciting.

We are going to have to do some exciting things, some creative things. Whether it is precisely as the Senator from Nebraska suggests, I do not know. But I like the thrust of it. I would differ on the bond issue part of it; we do not need any more indebtedness on the part of the Federal Government, but the rest of the idea, it seems to me, is fundamentally sound.

We are going to have to do something. We had a nice summit with the President and the Governors, great public relations, and I hope it does some good. It cannot do any harm.

But what we need, Mr. President, is a summit in Washington with the President of the United States and some key people like the Senator from Nebraska, who is creative and who says let us create a Federal partnership so we can do something about the school situation.

The Senator mentioned the 45 percent dropout rate in the city of Chicago. Do you know what the drop rate is in our No. 1 competitor economically, Japan? Two percent. The Senator mentioned teachers. Teachers in Japan are paid approximately the same as lawyers, doctors, and engineers, the top 10 percent. Teachers in Japan on college entrance exams score way above average. I regret to say—I do not mean this disparagingly; there are a lot of good, fine teachers in this country—American teachers score below average.

Can we do something about it? Of course we can, if we make it a priority. The Senator from Nebraska, who is a new Senator but is one of the finest—we have discovered that in a short time—is saying let us do something and let us be creative about it. If we really want to do something about education in this country, let us have the President of the United States not just with a fine public relations gesture in Charlottesville, VA. Let us get together in Washington and talk about a Federal partnership. And then we are going to have to use some resources.

The Senator from Nebraska is absolutely right. One of the reasons we do not talk more seriously about education is when we do we are going to have to devote resources to it.

I ask unanimous consent that a statement by Congressman DAN ROSTENKOWSKI in today's New York Times be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAMM-RUDMAN? LET THE AX FALL

(By Dan Rostenkowski)

WASHINGTON.—Now that the House has passed the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989, the deficit reduction bill designed to avoid automatic spending cuts under Gramm-Rudman, I have some advice for the members of the Senate, where the debate has stalled. If you think that the Federal budget deficit should be reduced, the surest way to accomplish that goal is to shelve this legislation and allow the Gramm-Rudman spending cuts to go into effect next Monday.

Every criticism of Gramm-Rudman is true. It is mindless, it represents an abdication of responsibility by the President and the Congress and it sends an awful signal to the markets about our ability to govern.

For all of its faults, however, Gramm-Rudman has one thing going for it—it can result in more real deficit reduction than we will ever achieve from the budget reconciliation bill.

The spending cuts under Gramm-Rudman, distributed across the board between defense and nondefense programs, would reduce the Federal deficit by $16 billion next year and by $80 billion over the next five years. By comparison, the legislation working its way through the Congress will reduce the deficit by only $16 billion over the next five years and will result in growing deficits in 1993 and beyond.

At the beginning of this year, we had a tremendous opportunity to confront the deficit. We had a new President, a new Congress and a growing public awareness of the need to put our fiscal house in order. Instead of grasping the opportunity, we decided on a "slide-by" budget, one that would provide only modest deficit reduction but that would set the stage for a grand compromise next year.

Whatever semblance of budget discipline existed at the beginning of this year's legislative process, however, has all but disappeared in recent weeks. The House, for example, rushed to accommodate budget-busting amendments to this bill. In addition to abandoning fiscal responsibility, the House fully retreated on several important initiatives, like repealing the catastrophic health care program, and started the assault on tax reform by passing a reduction in the capital gains tax.

I have been particularly distressed with the cynicism of President Bush's economic advisers, and his supporters in the Congress, in their approach to the entire debate. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, Richard Darman, has enthusiastically decried "now-nowism": the pursuit of immediate gratification rather than planning for the future. The Secretary of the Treasury, Nicholas Brady, has forcefully endorsed incentives to encourage long-term economic growth.

Yet the Administration has substituted "slide-by" budget plans, blue smoke and mirrors, off-budget financing and short-term revenue "surges" for sound budget discipline. The President's budget advisers have been driven by political concerns, with little, if any, regard for the real consequences of their budgetary actions.

Popularly elected presidents enjoy their greatest power and influence in their first year in office. George Bush is no exception. Yet he is squandering his influence to pursue a tax cut for the wealthiest 5 percent of our population in a year when our deficit exceeds $130 billion and study after study show the gap between rich and poor widening. What kind of priorities does that represent?

Our refusal to attack the deficit would be comic if it were not so irresponsible. We want the Federal Government to step up the war on drugs, but we are unwilling to pay for it. We can't walk down the street without stepping over living, breathing examples of homelessness. We can't keep up with the bills for a cleaner environment. We hide the bills for the savings and loan bail-out off-budget. We have 37 million Americans without health insurance and a child poverty rate that is a disgrace.

In a year when we should have been engaged in a serious debate about the national priorities, the deficit provided a wonderful fog to obscure the hard decisions that should have been made.

It's the sad truth that we have a President who refuses to lead and a Congress that is institutionally incapable of leading the deficit reduction effort. This has left budgetwatchers wondering what crisis will force the President, the Congress and even the public to finally confront the deficit.

The answer is Gramm-Rudman. Let the cuts go into effect next Monday. Make them permanent and make them hurt. And when the budget process begins next year, maybe all of us, starting with the President, will be ready to meet our collective responsibilities to govern.

Mr. SIMON. I have not always agreed with my House colleague, Congressman ROSTENKOWSKI, but he is saying we have to get hold of this deficit situation. He is saying letting sequester take place is not good but it is better than just drifting.

This ties in with what the Senator from Nebraska just said. When you have a $2.8-trillion indebtedness, if you reduce interest rates 1 percent, you save $28 billion. What if we were really to get hold of this deficit, signal the financial markets we are doing it, reduce interest rates 2 percent—that still puts us more than double the interest rates in Japan and West Germany—and use half of that on education? That would mean a 130-percent increase in Federal expenditures on education.

I think we are fortunate to have as a colleague the Senator from Nebraska. I simply want to stand up here and say I commend him for talking about, facing, and coming up with some creative ideas as a nation. We have to do this.

Mr. KERREY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMON. I am pleased to.

Mr. KERREY. The Senator from Illinois has pointed out that if we were to take dramatic action on the deficit we could free up additional resources by reducing the amount of money required to service the debt of this Nation. That is a much more desirable way to fund what I am talking about. There is no question that I support it totally. If we could come up with a way to not sequester, but come up with a way to give the Federal Reserve the room to move so as to be able to expand the money supply and get interest rates going down, trying to get a couple hundred basis points relived on interest rates, it would be far more desirable because we have I think to look at trying to produce more products and goods and services. We do not simply need to be looking all the time for ways to tax our way out of this problem.

I would also point out in response to the Senator saying how a problem in Illinois is something the Senator from Nebraska will be concerned about: One, it is the Senator from Illinois who called upon us in the United States of America to be concerned about the freedom of people living in Poland, and that our response should not be timid, that our response not fall short of the mark, and it was a great opportunity here. If we did not seize that opportunity, that opportunity is likely not to come up again, the world could change, the door could slam in our face, we could find ourselves faced with the repressive government in Poland, and a much worse situation than we have right now—that we had to seize the opportunity while it is there. He called to our attention the needs of the people of a nation across the Atlantic Ocean. We commend him for it.

I would call to the Senator's attention as well something that I know he understands. That is we have a similar kind of urgency to act in the United States today. Today there will be 3,000 children in the United States of America who will drop out of school. Monday there will be another 3,000 who will drop out of school; 3,000 students in the United States of America each and every day will drop out. They need a response. They need the kind of radical response that I see the citizens of Chicago being willing to attempt. They have taken over their schools.

Finally, I would point out I happened to be presiding the day that the Senator pointed out that the new Senate in Poland is being put together by freshmen Senators, and the risks associated with turning over representative democracy to the decisions of freshmen. Consider in Chicago we now have 5,400 freshmen members of the school council starting a business of running their schools. It is an enormous problem. It is extremely risky for these people to be attempting this.

Whether or not we can find the resources or not as I would like to do, at the very least we need to focus our attention upon people who are genuinely fighting for freedom right here at home, fighting for economic freedom for these young people so they will not leave the schools, fighting for prosperity for our future, and fighting for opportunity today.

I appreciate very much the Senator from Illinois calling our attention and urging us to action. I appreciate very much his kind thoughts.

Mr. SIMON. I thank my colleague from Nebraska. I agree with him on both accounts. First, there is no question we have to seize this opportunity in Poland particularly, and also in Hungary. We simply have to use the resources. This is one of those turning points in history. But in fact, every day for those 3,000 young people who drop out of school, that is a turning point for them in their history, and right now we have a dramatic change in Chicago.

There are going to be some bumps along the road. It is not all going to be smooth. But they recognize they have a problem of enormous proportions, and they are doing something about it. It is exciting.

We ought to be responding. We ought to be responding for a variety of reasons. But the Senator from Nebraska is right on target, and my hope is that somehow we can grasp this thing.

Frankly, and I do not mean this disrespectfully to the President. President Bush has been great in reaching out to those of us who are in Congress in both political parties in talking about various issues that are coming up, much better than under the Reagan Presidency.

Cabinet members are reaching out to us much more. But we are not facing the tough problems, the deficit. We are not facing that. This education thing we are not facing. The President has said he wants to be the education President, and he has proposed a $422-million program. That is nice. Four hundred and twenty-two million is one-thirtieth of 1 percent of the budget, almost nothing. He has proposed in his education budget one eight-hundredth of what he is suggesting we do to get that mission to Mars over. I think we had better—nothing against Mars; I do not know anyone from Mars—take a look at people in Omaha, and Blair, NE, where I hoped to be up there for a college homecoming this weekend at Dana College. Instead I am here on the floor of the U.S. Senate, and apparently we are going to be here tonight and tomorrow. But in Chicago and elsewhere we have to pay attention to our future. And that is in our schools. We are not doing it as we should.

I simply want to commend again the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. KERREY] saying let us do something. I hope the response will not just be silence on the part of the administration and our colleagues here in the Senate and the House.

Mr. President, I question the presence of a quorum.

Mr. President, I ask that the time consumed by my colleague from Nebraska and I be divided equally against the two sides in terms of the budget reconciliation.

Mr. DOMENICI. Reserving the right to object, and I will not object. Parliamentary inquiry. How much time remains on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico controls 2 hours and 6 minutes, and the Senator from Tennessee controls 1 hour and 59 minutes on the Democratic side, and all that time is charged.

Mr. DOMENICI. Of all the time used, it is charged to them?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. The suggestion from the Senator from Illinois is that it not be that way; rather it be equally, and I assume we will have about 2 hours and 1 minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One hour and about 50 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I question the presence of a quorum, and I ask that the time be equally divided during the quorum period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I assume that this body is awaiting a motion by the leadership, or perhaps Senator SASSER, the manager of the bill, to strip this bill of extraneous measures. Apparently it has been agreed to, and I heartily concur with this agreement.

I watched my friend from Colorado, Senator ARMSTRONG, pick up this 13-pound bill yesterday and say "this is no way to legislate," and indeed, he was absolutely right. It is no way to legislate.

I have a couple of goodies in this bill myself. I know that sometimes all of us feel a little bit unclean in committees, because once we start to slice the melon, nobody wants to be left at the station, nobody wants to go home and tell his people that the melon has been sliced, and they did not get any of it.

So we just keep doing these things to ourselves over and over again. That, Mr. President, is not to say that all of the 250 so-called extraneous items in this bill are without merit. On the contrary, a number of them, in my opinion, are highly meritorious. Every one of them will be considered at some point later, even capital gains, the President's version of which I strenuously oppose.

I read in the Washington Post about 3 weeks ago, several articles in the same edition, about the disarray of the Democrats. They said we are bankrupt for new ideas, and as a Member of the Democratic Party, of course that hurts; it stings when people write those articles. Interestingly enough, the same day, the New York Times had an article about how the Democrats were finally getting it together. It is hard to know who to believe these days.

I am not going to relieve myself of a political tone here. I just want to say that maybe the Democrats have not been brilliant with new ideas recently, but just because an idea is new does not make it good. For example, I do not think SDI is a good idea. I thought for a while that the Stealth bomber was a good idea, but now at $600 million each for a plane that may not even come close to fulfilling the mission for which it was bought, it certainly does not look like it is going to be a very good idea.

I do not believe going to Mars at a cost of $400 million, when we have three million people in this country without homes, is a good idea.

I do not think the fact that we rank 18th in infant mortality rates, well behind Panama, in the number of our children who die before the age of 1 is a good idea. It is a real mystery to me that we spend $150 billion a year that we do not have and we cannot provide homes for the homeless and we cannot seem to provide health care for the most vulnerable in our society, our children. Twenty-one percent of the children in the country below the age of 14, live below the poverty line. Can we really call ourselves a great nation and stand on the Senate floor and admit those irrefutable figures? I do not think adding 600 percent to the national debt in 13 years is a good idea. I did not think that the tax cut in 1981 was a good idea, and I stood right here at this desk—I was 1 of 11 Senators who voted against that bill—and made a very simple statement. I said you pass this tax cut and you are going to create deficits big enough to choke a mule. We promptly passed the tax cut and created deficits big enough to choke a mule and so far nothing has been done to rectify it. I mentioned a while ago I was opposed to the President's proposal on capital gains. I do not think it makes any sense. Why would we want to add $12 billion to the deficit over the next 5 years? Mr. President, did you know as of 10 minutes ago the stock market is down 110 points today? It is in a free-fall. You remember, on October 19, 1987, just 2 years ago, 6 more days and it will be 2 years, the stock market dropped 500 points in 1 day. I am not sure what caused this precipitous fall today, but I can tell you that at the root of it is the deficit. You pick up the Wall Street Journal in the morning and you are going to see big headlines in every paper in the country about the stock market and what happened to it today.

There are still 30 minutes left before the market closes, and it is dropping about 10 points every 10 minutes.

You will see stories in the morning about how the inflation figures that came out today might have caused it or airline stock or junk bonds, or some other event caused it. Underlying it all is the fact that the deficit is still out of control and the people of this country perceive that Congress is unwilling to address it.

Why would I vote for a bill—you can call this liberal, you can call it populist, you can call it anything you want to—why would I vote for a bill that adds $12 billion to a deficit that is out of control and 60 percent of the $12 billion goes to the two-tenths of 1 percent of the richest people in America?

A person near and dear to me said yesterday the people are tired of you Democrats redistributing the wealth or at least trying to. I said you are talking to a Democrat who is pretty sick of the redistribution of wealth too. In the last 8 years the top 20 percent of the people of this country have increased their share of the national wealth by 16 percent while the bottom 20 percent have lost 9 percent. I am pretty sick of that kind of redistribution, and now we want to add to the pocketbooks of those who have been blessed with prosperity.

So why would I vote for a bill that increases the deficit by $12 billion and 90 percent of it goes to people who make over $75,000 a year? In my State the median income is about $25,000. We have very few people who would ever derive a dime from this bill.

Mr. President half the families in my State make less than $25,000 a year and half of them make more. I recently listed my farm for sale, long before this bill was even considered. It is like cutting my heart out to sell my farm, but I just do not get enough rent off of it to warrant keeping it. I do not get to go there and enjoy it like I once did; wallow in the wild flowers, commune with nature, and watch coyotes, raccoons, and squirrels play.

So I decided to put it on the market. And if George Bush has his way, he will put an extra $30,000 in my pocket and I am not going to create one job by selling my farm. All I am going to do is not pay $30,000 in taxes that I was willing to pay when I put the farm on the market.

I have watched the stock market in the last few days and the volatility of it, and I have told some of my colleagues that I believed the market was very jittery. I told my wife Betty, as recently as 3 days ago that the market is ready for another tumble. There was simply no underlying economic factor to justify the increases we have been witnessing.

Mr. President, stripping this budget reconciliation bill of all the extraneous items is an excellent idea. It is not going to con the market, it is not going to reassure the American people that Congress is finally serious about deficits, but we will say to the American people at least we are disciplined enough here to do something that is very difficult. You know what we are striking out of that bill, among 249 other items including a $1.2 billion authorization for child care. Other than perhaps Senator DODD, I do not believe there is a person in this body who feels stronger about that bill than I do, and I hate to see it stripped out because we have to start all over again, and I know how difficult that is. Maybe impossible.

The President has threatened to veto the bill if that is in it, despite the figures I just gave you about the poverty level of children in this country, despite the fact that 87 percent of the women in this country who work say they do it out of economic necessity. They do not do it so they can go out and kick up their heels; they do it so they can go to work and provide the persons they love more than life itself, their children, with clothing, housing, and a decent education. And the least Congress can do is to assist in providing decent facilities for these children to be left in, a safe wholesome environment while their mothers do what they have to do—work.

It is especially critical to single women, heads of households. It does not speak well for us, Mr. President, that probably less than 50 percent of the fathers of this country who have the obligation of supporting their children, do so.

I am almost ashamed to admit this on the floor of the Senate, but I voted against Everett Koop when he came up for confirmation here as Surgeon General of the United States. All the public health administrators of the United States opposed Everett Koop.

I watched Nova last night on PBS, and I watch PBS more than I do anything else, and Nova is always good but last night there was an especially good documentary on former Surgeon General Everett Koop. I tell you he is not just the finest Surgeon General we ever had. He is a brilliant man. My daughter and I watched it. I said, "He is absolutely brilliant." She said, "he may be but really all he is saying, Dad, are just things that make common sense."

He talked about how the administration got upset when he came out with a book on AIDS because he was very explicit about how you deal with AIDS. He was very explicit about the fact that this is not just a homosexual problem. He was very specific about the fact that it is going to spread through the heterosexual community one of these days. He was specific about the fact that teenagers who think that because only 2 percent of the teenagers of this country are known to be infected, they think they are safe. But you know where the highest incidence of AIDS is? It was among people between the ages of 20 and 27. You know something else. They became infected when they were teenagers, they just were not showing symptoms of AIDS. So now the incidence of AIDS amongst teenagers, based on a very detailed story said just 3 days ago, say teenagers are very cavalier about AIDS and have not changed their habits.

Then I heard some people on the other side from the Surgeon General saying abstinence is the only way to deal with AIDS.

I can tell you, Mr. President, that that is a happy thought. But I wondered how some of those people who were talking conducted themselves when they were teenagers and youngsters. And the Surgeon General is saying it is not a question of whether that is the only solution. He was saying that in case they do not abstain, and about 70 percent do not, what do you do then?

Mr. President, I hope this bill will pass without further ado. If the leadership moves to table all the amendments, I am going to support the leadership. I want the bill passed. I am not interested in proclaiming victory.

A reporter asked me a while ago, "How can I possibly not write this as a great victory for the President?"

I said, why does someone have to have a victory?

I must tell you that in all candor, one of the things that used to irritate me most about Ronald Reagan; mind you Mr. President, I said one of the things. Every time he won a battle here in the Congress, he called it a great victory for the people and every time he lost one he could not believe how partisan and irresponsible Congress was. But, nobody is winning here except the American people. You do not have to have political winners and political losers in every bill that passes.

Of course, the press is going to report it one way or the other. There is not any way to stop that. But I am grateful to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the majority leader, the minority leader, the ranking members, the chairman and ranking members of the Budget Committee for sitting down and negotiating in good faith and coming up with the idea of stripping this bill of all those extraneous items.

Mr. President, do you want to hear something really sad? For over 100 years, the lower Mississippi River Delta has been the poorest area in America. I think my former distinguished colleague Senator Stennis, before he left the Senate, said his one regret was that he had never done anything to alleviate and address the problems of poverty in what we in that area call the delta. Eleven million people living from the southern tip of Illinois to the mouth of that river in New Orleans, 11 million people and over 40 percent of them living below the poverty line. And so I introduced a bill to do something about it.

I take some pride, Mr. President, in the fact that this situation has existed 100 years and as best I can tell, I am the first person to ever even notice, let alone try to do something about it. But last year I got a bill passed to establish a commission, funded at $2 million, to study the problems over a 2-year period and come to Congress with recommendations on how we can alleviate what I consider to be the worst blights on this great Nation.

It is hard to get anybody interested in something unless it happens in their State. I had no difficulty lining up every single Senator in the seven States affected to cosponsor the bill. They know and understand the problem. But you have difficulty getting anybody else's attention.

I will tell you an interesting little personal story. Senator BRADLEY, our esteemed, beloved colleague from New Jersey was in Mississippi last year. He was campaigning for MIKE ESPY. MIKE ESPY's district is in the heart of the delta. He has in his district, Tunica County, which has consistently been the poorest county in America, well over 50 percent poverty for as long as the memory of man runneth.

And when I walked in that door across this Chamber on Monday morning, Senator BRADLEY came toward me and said, "Don't you have a bill in here on the delta?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Put me down as a cosponsor." I said, "I don't understand this." He said, "I spent the last 3 days in that area and I will help you any way I can. I could not believe what I saw."

And today the Wall Street Journal has a long, detailed description of the problem. Mr. President I ask unanimous consent at this point that the Wall Street Journal article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Oct. 13, 1989]

RIVER OF DESPAIR: ALONG THE RICH BANKS OF THE MISSISSIPPI LIVE POOREST OF U.S. POOR

(By Dennis Farney)

ELAINE, AR.—It could be a dog house, up on bricks above the gluey yellow clay. Except that it is bigger than a dog house—and a human being lives inside.

In the dank, dark interior of his two-room shack, 63-year-old Robert Britton sits on a bed with sheets gray-black with grime. His conversation rambles at the edge of incoherence. He hitches a pant leg up and down in an absent, almost mechanical way.

You leave him, finally, standing on his porch. "Don't you worry about me," he says with a wild laugh. A cold rain beats down on his grim little house and those surrounding it.

To the north, up the winding, gunmetal-gray Mississippi River, Renee Lamm talks with quiet wonderment of her medical practice, straight out of the Great Depression.

COUNTY'S SOLE DOCTOR

She is the only doctor in Lake County, Tenn. The nearest X-ray machine is 35 miles away. Dr. Lamm tries to diagnose with a second-hand microscope, then usually discovers her patients can't afford the medicine. She recently helped save an infant boy with a liver abscess as big as a softball. She blames sewage-polluted drinking water.

"These are the kind of things you see in Haiti or Mexico," Dr. Lamm says softly. "Not the United States."

But this is the lower Mississippi Delta, certified by Congress as the poorest region in America. Poorer than Franklin D. Roosevelt's Tennessee Valley, poorer than John F. Kennedy's Appalachia. Poorer and much blacker—and thus politically neglected until a rising black vote began transforming Southern politics.

Further proof of that transformation comes Monday, when a year-old commission makes it initial report to Congress and the White House. It will test whether Washington, hamstrung by deficits and debating how many B-2 bombers to buy at $500 million apiece, has time and money for a rural region where infant mortality rates in some counties rival those of Third World countries.

BURDEN OF HISTORY

Behind the statistics assembled by the Lower Mississippi Delta Development Commission lie the paradox and the burden of Delta history.

"We have the river. We have a central location. Yet we've had 100 years of poverty," says Ed Jones, a retired Tennessee congressman and a member of the commission. "It's not just economically based. The effort to keep some down kept all down."

Or, at least, most down.

For here is a region that epitomizes the extremes of American wealth and poverty. It is almost unbelievably fertile, with topsoil 25 feet thick or more. It has mansions and big cars and a wealthy gentry that for decades has gathered round the fountain in the ornate lobby of Memphis's grand old Peabody Hotel. It has fields of cotton like white flowers in bloom, rice and soybeans and venerable tress that lend a benignant grace to even the poorest dwelling. Its place names roll off the tongue like molasses—Tallahatchie and Yalobusha; Gilt Edge, Tenn., and Braggadocio, Mo.

But, especially along the Mississippi, it has county poverty rates that range from 20% to 50%-plus. In testimony before the commission, one Tennessee civic leader told of building a fence around a school to keep children from playing in raw sewage. It has white as well as black poverty, and good ol' boys who gather over coffee to talk of dove hunting and running deer with dog packs.

Official segregation, of course, is dead. But a de factor segregation lives on. In Helena, Ark., black youths cruise over lower Walnut Street at night; whites cruise Cherry Street, a block away.

What the Delta doesn't have is a stabilizing middle class. "Most of our 'middle class' is two paychecks away from poverty," says Wilber Hawkins, the commission's own executive director. At West-Helena, Ark., attorney L.T. Simes dryly observed in one hearing: "Some have said that we have too many rich people and too many poor people."

The poor tend to melt into the background, along back roads or in notorious neighborhoods such as Sugar Ditch, a place of shacks and open sewers finally cleared away by Tunica, Miss., after it helped land the town on CBS-TV's "60 Minutes" several years ago. But they stand out grimly in a place they call The Line. It is a grubby little neighborhood in West Helena where blacks bring their dreams to die.

"You can get a lady here for $5," says Linda Messenger, an energetic federal worker who grew up not far away. Then she talks of a woman who sold herself for 25 cents. Behind a dumpster on a street.

"In this area, a good husband is hard to find," says Ms. Messenger, who has three children and has married a second time. After a series of brutal experiences, she reached a determined conclusion: "I'm not going to let men pull me down."

Out beyond The Line, in a small house amid the soybean fields, a 31-year-old woman named Beulah (she declines to give her last name) struggles to survive with seven children and no husband in the home. She sits watching Oprah Winfrey on TV and talking—haltingly, as in a dream—of her life and her children: "I just started so fast."

Beyond sheer poverty and human wreckage, the Delta got a bigger dose than either the Tennessee Valley and Appalachia of what Mr. Jones, the former congressman, calls "the plantation mentality." It is an ingrained attitude—rooted in the region's history. The landowning rich remain complacently superior. "Whereas they once rode horses [to oversee their holdings] they now ride pickups," Mr. Jones says. The poor, too often, remain apathetic, without any realistic job prospects and utterly dependent on welfare.

In Phillips County, Ark., home of The Line and the hardscrabble town of Elaine, government transfer payments are a top industry, bringing roughly $20 million a year. "Everybody's on relief and food stamps," Mr. Jones says. "You can't help them, except keep them alive."

HIGH INFANT MORTALITY

Even that can be hard to do. The commission notes that 1980-84 infant-mortality rates in four Mississippi counties exceeded 25 per 1,000—worse than Panama's. And its statistical portrait of the region portrays a social fabric fraying away like a cheap rug on the floor.

The commission estimates that 47 of the 214 counties in its target area have poverty rates exceeding 30%, with many of the rest topping 20%. Based on 1979-80 census figures, it says that in Lake County, Tenn., some households (a loose definition that could mean one person or a dozen) were trying to live on as little as $1,954 a year, excluding Social Security.

That Pope County, Ill., had a high-school dropout rate just shy of 53%. And that only four Arkansas counties accounted for one-third of that state's infant mortality in 1986.

At rock bottom, measured by its estimated 50% poverty rate, is Tunica County, Miss. Bobby H. Papasan, a thoughtful, candid man who is the former school superintendent there, defended his town and county on CBS. But he admits, "One of the ways we kept down the dropout rate was to pass out cheap diplomas. And, let's face it, our definition of high-school education may have been one of the lowest going."

It is almost impossible for an outsider to see the world as Tunica children see it, he says over lunch at the Blue and White Restaurant. He recalls questioning young children to determine the boundaries—the outer limits—of their world. For many, the world ended short of the county line. Today, he says, some of the best high-school graduates, girls as well as boys go into the military. It's a way out, an escape.

But the Delta already has witnessed one great escape, a forced human migration that ranks with that of the Dust Bowl Okies to California. The post-World War II agricultural revolution brought great machines that prowled the fields like metal beasts. That uprooted tens of thousands of sharecroppers and propelled them into cities such as Memphis and Chicago.

FROM BAD TO WORSE

Sharecropping was bad. The plantation owner tethered the sharecropper with lines of credit from the plantation store; when another plantation "brought" him, it paid off his debts. But what the great migration left behind may be worse: A land that, for many, has no jobs of any kind.

To create jobs, Democratic Rep. Mike Espy talks of building "value added" processing plants to supplement the largely agricultural economy. As a case in point, he has already persuaded the Army to eat about 65% more catfish—after cotton, Mississippi's largest cash crop, he says. Mr. Espy, a House leader in the commission legislation, represents a Delta district where unemployment averages 12% but, among blacks, nears 50% in some counties.

Rep. Espy, in 1986 the first black elected to Congress from Mississippi since Reconstruction, epitomizes a second revolution, a still-continuing political upheaval that has reshaped the Delta and made creation of the commission politically possible. The civil-rights movement of the 1960s produced the Voting Rights Act and a swelling black vote. The black vote, as much as anything, was responsible for the 1986 elections of several white Democratic senators, among them Georgia's Wyche Fowler, Alabama's Richard Shelby and Louisiana's John Breaux. At the same time, traditionally gut-Democratic Mississippi has two Republican senators now, Thad Cochran and Trent Lott, who themselves are reaching out to black voters.

These crosscurrents create a unique window in time when a concerted Delta development program is at least politically possible. But creating it won't be easy, and funding it will be even harder.

"The country's broke, unfortunately," says Arkansas Democratic Sen. Dale Bumpers, the prime Senate sponsor of the commission. "And you cannot put in enough Federal money, even if we had it, to solve the problem." (The commission is charged with designing a 10-year recovery program.) Instead, Sen. Bumpers talks of a combination approach: Some new money, a retargeting of existing federal programs, more federal-state-local cooperation and more federal purchases of Delta products. "It's supposed to take 10 years. It may take a second 10 years," he says.

At stake is the future of a region already bypassed by much of the postwar economic boom and now in danger of being left hopelessly behind in a computer-age America. "All we want is a little piece of the pie," says John E. Vaughn, the Tiptonville, Tenn., city attorney. "It's a wealthy country. Just a little piece of the pie."

Mr. BUMPERS. But I have warned the people of the delta not to think the U.S. Treasury is going to solve the problem. We are broke. We are broke. We are not going to be able to take money out of the Treasury and do it. Oh, we might be able to help some. But this Commission is going to have to come up with some creative ideas. Maybe we could make more purchases by the Pentagon or government in general from suppliers in the delta. But for us to sit by and allow this shameless poverty to exist in a land of plenty is unacceptable, and I intend to continue pursuing that as long as I am in this body.

Mr. President, one other little thing that is unrelated. I was reading an article in the same Wall Street Journal about Roh Tae Woo, the President of Korea, who is coming here next week to visit with President Bush. We welcome him. I guess he is really the first democratically elected head of state the South Koreans have had.

We are doing everything we can to promote democracy all over the world—Hungary, Poland, South Korea, you name it. And this morning, as you know, a bunch of rioters broke into the American Ambassador's residence in South Korea, and looted the place. In my opinion, that was obviously done to embarrass the President of South Korea as he came to this country for an official visit.

As you know, Mr. President, I offered an amendment the other evening, along with Senators BENTSEN and JOHNSTON, to start withdrawing our troops from South Korea. But I want that decision, which certainly is going to be made, I want it to be made on the realities, not some episode that a few renegade students in South Korea caused in an effort to embarrass their President. The amendment to start withdrawing our troops from South Korea stands on its own merits, stands on its own rationale.

It is true that as long as we have the kind of presence that we have in South Korea now, the dissidents are going to blame us for every untoward thing that happens in the country. And perhaps one reason to remove ourselves would be to remove ourselves as the lightning rod and perceived cause of every untoward thing that happens in South Korea.

Mr. President, I will close. I know the Senator from South Carolina is waiting to speak. But I just want to say that once we pass this bill today, this reconciliation measure, I will be pleased, grateful to those who negotiated this compromise to get it passed. But this body is going to still be faced with the country's No. 1 problem, the deficit. When you consider the fact that in 1976, when Jimmy Carter held up his right hand and said, "I will," the deficit was a little over $400 billion. Mr. President, that was 13 years ago.

You think about the deficit at that time, created during the preceding 187 years; that was the year we celebrated our 200th birthday but actually it was the 200th birthday of the Declaration of Independence. It was not until 13 years later that the First Congress convened. So I guess you could say that that $400 billion debt the country owed at that time was what we had accumulated from 187 years of our history. And listen to this: In 13 years, in 13 years, we have increased the debt 600 percent to $2.8 trillion.

So, when my daughter said last night, Surgeon General Koop may be a brilliant man, but he is just talking sense, I thought, there is not a dirt farmer in my home county of Franklin, in the great State of Arkansas, who does not know this country is not going to make it continuing our present path. When we consider where we stand in education, infant mortality, 38 million people with no health care, 3 million people homeless, getting drug use under control which will cost tens of millions, dead last in education by every measure, the billions we are going to have to spend to clean up our environment, or as Chief of Seattle once said: foul our nest until we won't be able to sleep in it.

What is it, 50 million, 80 million bridges in this country that are falling in? Think about our problems. It is going to take, not just some creative thinking, Mr. President, but it is going to take some spine stiffener.

In the fall of 1986, some of us said, "Instead of cutting the tax rate from 38 percent to 28 percent, leave it at 38 percent until we see the deficit on a definite downward spinal."

We said let the Defense Department take a 5-percent cut, too. We cut the costs of living for everyone, and we promised to balance the budget in four years. We had 43 cosponsors on that bill, Mr. President.

Senators began to come on the floor and people said: You better not vote for that. You know how volatile cost-of-living increases are. We had 43 cosponsors and we only got 25 votes. Sure enough, when I ran in 1986 I had to face that. But I got 62 or 63 percent of the vote, so I just say to my colleagues, it is not fatal to do something that is really responsible around here and go home and talk to your folks about it. Don't be afraid to talk sense to them. They know common sense when they hear it.

Mr. President, this is the first time I have spoken on the floor for some time. This is the first time I have spoken on this bill. I hope I haven't inconvenienced anybody, but the Senator from South Carolina has waited patiently, Mr. President, and I yield the floor and give the Senator from South Carolina an opportunity to speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND].

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed as if in morning business and charge it to this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator may proceed to speak out of order and with the time charged against the time on his side.

FLAG PROTECTION AMENDMENT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to have printed in the RECORD three articles and a resolution unanimously adopted by the American Legion in support of a constitutional amendment to protect the American flag. The resolution was adopted by the Legion at their 71st national convention in Baltimore, MD, earlier this year, and was included in the October 2, 1989, edition of The American Legion News Service, along with three other articles about the flag.

Speaking from the standpoint of my own involvement with the American Legion, I know of no group more qualified to speak and write about the importance of the flag to the life of our country. These are the people who have worn the uniform, borne the battle scars, and literally carried the flag into battle. Because of their experiences, many of them have a depth of understanding of the flag, which many Americans may not have.

Accordingly, when their 3 million members speak, it is important that we carefully consider what they have to say. In this case, they have spoken in a clear voice in support of a constitutional amendment to protect the flag.

Shortly after being discharged from the Army at the end of World War II, I joined American Legion Post 30 in Edgefield, SC, and later moved my membership to post 26 in Aiken, where I maintain my permanent residence. Today, I am proud to be a life member of the Legion. The members of the American Legion are true believers in America and the inherent goodness of our people. The principles of the Legion are lofty, and its work with Boys and Girls State, Americanism oratorical contests, and high school summer baseball programs represents the best of what is good for America.

I personally believe an amendment to the Constitution is the best way to assure protection of this enduring symbol of our Nation, and I am pleased to be the sponsor of such an amendment.

Just last week, the Senate passed H.R. 2978, a flag-protection statute, which I supported. However, as mentioned, I continue to believe a well-drafted constitutional amendment is the most prudent course to follow to ensure the integrity of the American flag. We will soon have the opportunity to vote on a constitutional amendment. I see no reason why this Congress should not also pass the amendment. As a practical matter, the Federal statute would likely be in place, while the State legislatures consider a proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. President, in closing, I want to also take this opportunity to commend the newly elected national commander of the Legion, Miles Epling, for his fine leadership on flag protection. In addition, I want to commend the immediately past national commander, H.F. "Sparky" Gierke, for his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee on a flag-protection amendment. Each of these men have given a great amount of their time to this Nation, not only in the Armed Forces, but also in their leadership posts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the articles and resolution I previously mentioned be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUBJECT: FLAG DESECRATION

Approved as Consolidated—Resolution No. 355 (Convention Committee on Americanism)

Whereas, The Constitution of the United States provides many readily available methods of expression which can be used as a form of protest; and

Whereas, There exist federal and state penal codes to protect the Flag of the United States from desecration, and

Whereas, The Supreme Court of the United States, in TEXAS vs. JOHNSON, decided June 21, 1989, ruled that an individual could not be prosecuted for desecrating the Flag of the United States, as such an act was constitutionally protected as freedom of speech under the First Amendment to the United States Constitution; and

Whereas, This ruling established a precedent which may invalidate all existing state and federal laws which have been enacted to protect the Flag of the United States from such malicious abuse and desecration; and

Whereas, Neither our Founding Fathers, members of Congress and State Legislators, nor any responsible person in the history of our Republic, ever intended that anybody should be allowed to desecrate and mutilate the very Flag which has stood as a beacon of hope to the oppressed peoples of the world; and

Whereas, The Flag of the United States is a living symbol of all our freedoms, morally obligating all responsible citizens to preserve, protect, and venerate the Flag of the United States; and

Whereas, Protection of the Flag of the United States from desecration can only be assured by the enactment of a Constitutional Amendment; and

Whereas, The American Legion spearheaded the development and adoption of the United States Flag Code and the several laws enacted to protect the Flag of the United States; now, therefore be it

Resolved, By the American Legion in National Convention assembled in Baltimore, Maryland, September 5, 6, 7, 1989, That the American Legion express its unequivocal opposition to allowing desecration of the Flag of the United States; and, be it further

Resolved, The American Legion encourage its members and all Americans to wage a "positive protest" through a petition drive in support of the adoption and ratification of a Constitutional Amendment, giving the Congress the power to enact narrowly drawn legislation to protect the Flag of the United States, and by displaying the Flag of the United States on a daily basis; and, be it finally

Resolved, That the American Legion petition the governments of the United States and the Fifty States, seeking adoption and ratification of a Constitutional Amendment giving the Congress the power to enact narrowly drawn legislation to protect the Flag of the United States.

COMMANDER CALLS FOR "REDOUBLED" CAMPAIGN FOR FLAG'S PROTECTION

WASHINGTON.—National Commander Miles S. Epling has called on the more than 3,000,000 members of The American Legion to redouble their efforts to seek a constitutional amendment to protect the U.S. Flag from physical desecration.

"We have won a big victory in forcing the House of Representatives leadership to permit a full House vote on a flag amendment proposal," Epling said, citing:

1) The effect of the "first wave" of more than one million signatures on Legion petitions presented Aug. 31 to Congress.

2) The results of a Gallup Poll which showed a large majority of Americans support a constitutional amendment to protect the flag.

3) And Congress' reaction to a flood of phone calls to House and Senate members by Legionnaires from a phone bank at the National Convention in Baltimore, where delegates unanimously approved a resolution calling for a constitutional amendment to protect the flag.

In a letter to all post and department commanders, and other Legion leaders, Epling appealed to all Legionnaires, Auxiliary members, and Sons of The American Legion to continue the campaign to gather signatures on petitions calling for a constitutional amendment.

"We may have won a battle," Epling said, "but the war is not over until the flag is protected by a constitutional amendment." The National Commander asked that all members also set up telephone banks in their communities and appeal to their neighbors to contact their Congressmen and Senators by mail and by phone.

"We know that a piece of flag protection legislation like that passed by the House on September 12th will not survive a court test", Epling said. "We must keep up the pressure on both the House and Senate by more petitions and phone calls because both bodies have scheduled votes on flag amendment proposals during the week of October 16th. We will not be satisfied until Congress has adopted and the states have ratified a constitutional amendment that prohibits physical desecration of our flag."

Commander Epling reminded all commanders to appoint a three member Citizens Flag Honor Guard Committee at post, district, and department levels, to oversee the campaign to achieve an amendment. Names and addresses of the Flag Honor Guard Committee members should be sent to the Americanism Commission at National Headquarters as soon as possible.

Senate Panel Hears Legion on Flag Amendment

WASHINGTON.—The American Legion's support for a constitutional amendment to protect the U.S. flag from desecration is as strong as ever, and is bolstered by a groundswell of petition signers and the results of a Gallup Poll, Congress has been told.

Testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Immediate Past National Commander H.F. "Sparky" Gierke said, "I urge the members of Congress to resist the most expedient course of action and take instead the most effective one."

Gierke's testimony before the committee, chaired by Senator Joseph Biden, D-Del., followed comments by Sens. Robert Dole, R-Kan. and Alan Dixon, D-Ill. Both senators supported the efforts to draft and approve a constitutional amendment.

In his opening statement, Sen. Biden noted that the hearing followed by one day the House's approval by a 380-38 margin of a statute to protect the flag. The bill, which one member of the House called the "Flag Burners' Protection Act of 1989," is designed to make it illegal for anyone to destroy the flag.

"The purpose of this hearing is to decide what, if anything, should be done to protect the flag," Sen. Biden said. Besides Sens. Dole and Dixon, representatives of the major veterans' organizations discussed their groups' view on flag protection.

The committee's ranking minority member, Sen. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, said that he supported the statutory and the amendment process. "A statute might protect the flag," he said. "A constitutional amendment definitely would.

"If anyone understands the meaning of the flag, it is the veterans of this country."

Senator Dole's testimony centered on his support for a constitutional amendment as the only reliable remedy to the dilemma of how to effectively protect the U.S. flag.

"After the (Supreme Court) decision in June, I was puzzled and disappointed," Dole said. "I couldn't put it together. You can't destroy money. You can't destroy a mailbox. In some states you can't even cut those tags off your mattress, but the Supreme Court said that you can burn the flag."

He referred to the Legion-sponsored Gallup Poll, which showed an overwhelming number of Americans support a constitutional amendment and do not feel that their rights will be threatened.

"The amendment we propose will protect the flag," Dole said. "It will do nothing more and it will do nothing less."

"It is clear that the people of this country are angry. I do not question anyone's integrity or patriotism, but we must understand that the flag is the one symbol that unites us as a nation. It transcends all of our differences and our diversity.

"The flag deserves constitutional protection."

Senator Dixon noted that public opinion polls across Illinois showed overwhelming support for a constitutional amendment. "This issue is still alive across the country, even if it is not in the headlines. The people know what they want."

"The people," Dole noted sardonically, don't get to hear from the 'experts.' They have to make up their own minds."

Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Paul Simon, D-Ill., said that they deplored flag burning, and supported a way to punish those who would desecrate the flag, but stopped short of endorsing an amendment. "We cherish the Constitution," Leahy said. "We have to be careful about chipping away at the Bill of Rights."

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, said that he would not only vote for an amendment, but would also vote against legislation. "We cannot get into the business of trying to overturn Supreme Court decisions by passing statutes," he said. "The proposed amendment does not alter the Bill of Rights in any way."

Senator Biden asked Gierke if the Legion would continue to support a constitutional amendment if he could guarantee that a statute would protect the flag and not be overturned by the Supreme Court.

"The American Legion does not seek to complicate this issue," Gierke said. "But, I don't know how you can make such a guarantee."

Biden also asked if the Legion would be opposed if patently offensive groups displayed the U.S. flag at their meetings. "We are simply trying to undo what has been done," the Legion's former commander said. "As long as any group displays the flag properly and shows it the proper respect, the proposed amendment would not apply."

Flag Protection Proposal Draws Delegates' Unanimous Approval

BALTIMORE.—The 71st National Convention of The American Legion unanimously adopted a resolution calling for a constitutional amendment to protect the U.S. flag from physical desecration.

Resolutions from 32 departments were consolidated into Resolution 355—"Flag Desecration." Gary Sammons of Michigan, chairman of the Convention Committee on Americanism, in presenting the resolution to the delegates for their action, said most Americans feel anguish, hurt, and humiliation over the U.S. Supreme Court decision considering flag burning as part of political protest constitutionally protected as a freedom of speech under the First Amendment.

The resolution details the Legion's concern over that decision, noting the ruling "establishes a precedent which may invalidate all existing state and federal laws which have been enacted to protect the flag."

The resolution calls for the Legion to continue to lead the nationwide petition drive in support of a constitutional amendment. Before the convention opened, more than one million signatures had been counted.

The resolution also continues the Legion's positive protest theme to display the flag in accordance with the U.S. Flag Code which was developed with significant Legion coordination.

After the passage of Resolution 355, the house lights dimmed and an video production, featuring actor Larry Wilcox, was shown on two giant television screens. Wilcox told of his strong support for the constitutional amendment and deep belief in the flag which he described as "probably my best friend."

With adoption of the resolution, many delegates used a phone bank in a room at the Convention Center to call their lawmakers. In 12 hours of operation more than 8,000 calls were made. At one point the flood of calls jammed a telephone exchange in Washington.

In an emotional seconding speech in favor of the resolution, Daniel J. O'Connor of New York exhorted the delegates to "raise your voices through local legislators. The hour has come to call for a constitutional amendment." O'Connor drew a roar of approval from the delegates when he said the American people were tired of letting "some coconut, or some stupid crackpot, or even some intellectual jackasses ignorant beyond common sense" desecrate the flag without fear of punishment.

Delegates also received a special "Stand By Our Flag" kit which included bumper stickers, and flag pins.

After the convention's action on the flag amendment resolution, a member of the House Judiciary Committee affirmed the Legion's position that the flag will not be protected by legislation without a constitutional amendment.

Charles G. Douglas, R-N.H., told delegates "The Flag Protection Act of 1989" (H.R.-2978) is a "sham and a shame."

"It's a sham because it doesn't do what you want it to do, and it's a shame because a constitutional amendment would fix what is broken." he said.

He called on delegates, and all Legionnaires, to contact their representatives and voice their concern that legislation under consideration will not protect the flag.

On the eve of the Convention in Baltimore, National Commander H.F. "Sparky" Gierke presented to Congress the signatures of more than 1 million Americans who support a constitutional amendment to protect the Flag of the United States from physical desecration.

Gierke delivered the petitions during a news conference in the U.S. Capitol. The signatures, gathered by members of The American Legion and the American Legion Auxiliary, were presented to Sens. Robert Dole, R-Kans.; and John Warner, R-Va.; and Reps. Gerald Solomon, R-N.Y.; and Charles Douglas, R-N.H.

"The Supreme Court decision struck a nerve," Gierke said. "In the small town of Cedarburg, Wisconsin, population 9,005, Legionnaires from Post 288 went to the county fair, the shopping center, and door-to-door, and collected 5,173 signatures. Nearly every adult citizen in that town supported a constitutional amendment."

Gierke also released the results of a Gallup Poll that showed that nearly two-thirds of those polled support a constitutional amendment to protect the flag. Seventy percent of those asked believe a flag protection amendment would not place their freedom of speech in jeopardy.

(The remarks of Mr. THURMOND pertaining to the introduction of S. 1755 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIXON). Is there objection to charging the time equally? Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRYOR). Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT—H.R. 3385

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that amendments numbered 996 through 1001 be considered as having been timely filed for purposes of rule XXII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this consent was necessary because the Senate was in recess today when these amendments could have been filed. It does not add amendments to the list that are in order, postcloture.

OMNIBUS BUDGET RECONCILIATION ACT

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume consideration of the reconciliation bill 1 hour after the list of matter to be stricken has been available on the Senate floor and that at that time there be a total of 3 hours for debate remaining on the bill, equally divided and controlled between Senators SASSER and DOMENICI, and that the majority leader be recognized to offer the joint leadership motion to strike matter from the bill on which there will be 1 hour equally divided, and at the expiration or yielding back of time the Senate proceed to vote on the motion without any intervening action, and that any amendment or debatable motion offered thereafter be considered under a time limitation of 30 minutes, and that the control and division of time be in the usual form.

I further ask unanimous consent that after S. 1750 has been read for the third time, the Senate then proceed to the House companion measure, H.R. 3299, that all after the enacting clause be stricken, the text of S. 1750 as amended be substituted in lieu thereof, the bill be read for the third time, and the Senate proceed to vote on passage of the bill without any intervening action or debate.

I further ask unanimous consent that if the leadership motion to strike matter is defeated, this agreement be null and void and there then be a total of 3 hours remaining on S. 1750, equally divided, with all other provisions of the Budget Act in effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the majority leader's request?

Mr. DOLE. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, in accordance with what we were requesting before the request was entered, this means everything—we talked about striking matter—that is everything, including the Finance Committee?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct.

Mr. DOLE. That is the entire load.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct. As the distinguished Republican leader and I discussed in advance, the reference in the first sentence of this request, which I now repeat, "1 hour after the listed matter to be stricken has been available on the Senate floor," the reference to the listed matter to be stricken there includes the entire list, including the Finance Committee portion.

As the distinguished Republican leader knows, the Budget Committee portion of the list, which embraces all other committees, is now complete. We are awaiting the final decision by the chairman and ranking member of the Finance Committee with respect to the listed matters within the jurisdiction of the Finance Committee to be stricken. When that is received, that will be incorporated into the document which the Budget Committee has prepared, and when that complete list is ready on the Senate floor, Senators will then have 1 hour to review it. They can determine what is proposed to be stricken. Thereafter, the expiration of that hour, the Senate will resume consideration of the reconciliation bill, and I will be recognized to offer the joint leadership motion to strike that matter.

Mr. DOLE. If the majority leader will yield further, in addition, they are going to get a list of what is in and what is out? I think that is going to be possible.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am advised that the list that will be available will be the list of all matters to be stricken. I know that there are some additional documents which have been prepared by some staff members identifying lists of what will remain, but I understand from the staff those may not be complete at that time. When we say a list of matter to be stricken, it is the complete list of matter to be stricken, inclusive of finance. We will try to have information available at that time as to what remains as well. The list of what remains is not included in the definition of the term which I have stated in this unanimous-consent request.

Mr. DOLE. I say further, it is a substantial amount. We weighed the material before and it was almost 13 pounds. Now it is down to 3 pounds something. So we are striking out 9 pounds. I cannot tell you what is in it, but it is 9 pounds.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the standard of our progress is by weight, then we are making progress.

Mr. DOLE. Some would say we are.

Mr. DOMENICI. Could I ask the distinguished majority leader, that hour will start to run when the list is available on the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is right.

Mr. DOMENICI. Might he tell us now how we will start that 1 hour running? When we have the list, are we to announce it or is the majority leader to announce it?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is my intention that we would do two things: That we would come back and have the Senate resume session, at which time we would announce here that the list is available, and, in addition, we will, through the Cloakrooms of both parties, hotline every office to notify them that the list is ready, so that Senators will be advised both through our coming back in and making a public statement to that effect and through the mechanism of our respective Cloakrooms notifying each office immediately by phone.

Mr. DOMENICI. This is it. I am told that is what was. This is what it looks like now. I think that is progress. I have not read it yet.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I renew my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS SUBJECT TO THE CALL OF THE CHAIR

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

There being no objection, at 5:15 p.m., the Senate took a recess, subject to the call of the Chair.

The Senate reassembled at 8:30 p.m. when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. ROBB].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the majority leader, Senator MITCHELL.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished chairmen and ranking members of the Budget and Finance Committees and their staffs, who have been laboring vigorously to prepare for the Members of the Senate the documents which I am about to describe and which are now available for review by interested Senators. They include a document prepared by the Finance Committee which lists all matters relating to spending provisions in the finance title of this bill that are to be stricken; a document from the Finance Committee that lists all revenue matters which are to be stricken; and a document embracing the jurisdiction of all other committees, which identifies all matters to be stricken in the proposed motion to strike, which will be the order of business when the Senate returns to consideration of this matter.

Mr. President, the unanimous-consent agreement now in force provides for the offering of a motion to strike. The Finance Committee has prepared an amendment that strikes all of their titles and inserts only the agreed-to matter. To accommodate this amendment I ask unanimous consent that an amendment that strikes and inserts be in order, in lieu of the motion to strike previously provided for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in the previous order it was anticipated that there would be 1 hour before we commenced action on the legislation. In view of the lateness of the hour and the fact that the preparation of the lists proved to be more time consuming than anticipated, it is my view that we should commence action on the bill again at 9, which would be about a half-hour from the time the final lists were ready. Many Senators have been here and reviewed portions of the list that have been available. I apologize for the inconvenience this may cause to Senators but, on the other hand, it will enable us to complete action earlier than otherwise anticipated, or earlier than would otherwise be the case. I have had a number of Senators urging that course of action as well.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the previous order be modified and that the Senate return to consideration of the reconciliation bill at 9 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, the previous unanimous-consent order is modified in accordance with the majority leader's request.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, Senators should be aware that the manner of proceeding will be as follows: At 9 we will return to consideration of the reconciliation bill. The order of business then will be a motion to strike, which I will make in behalf of the joint leadership, and which will be subject to 1 hour of debate, equally divided.

Thereafter there will be remaining, if the full 1 hour is consumed, 2 additional hours during which other amendments can be offered if Senators so choose. Any such amendment offered would be subject to a 30-minute time limit, equally divided. I do not now know whether any such amendments will be offered. It is my hope that the motion to strike will prevail and that there will be no further amendments offered. But, of course, Senators are free, particularly after reviewing the results of the motion to strike, to offer such amendments as they choose.

It is our hope that we will be able to proceed expeditiously to completion of action on this bill, there having already been a lengthy delay which I know has caused all Senators great inconvenience.

So, Senators should be prepared, if they have an interest in participating in the debate on the motion to strike, to be present in the Senate at or immediately following 9 p.m., at which time that will occur.

Mr. President, I again want to extend my thanks to the distinguished chairmen and ranking members of the Budget and Finance Committees who, along with their staffs, have been working very earnestly and very hard over the past several hours to advance us to this point.

I will be pleased to yield to the distinguished ranking member of the Finance Committee if he cares to make any additional comment; and the chairman of the Budget Committee and the chairman of the Finance Committee are here as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD].

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I agree with everything the majority leader said. I wonder if he would mind if I asked him an unrelated question as to what he plans to do about Nicaragua.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I will be pleased to respond. Earlier this evening I was asked in behalf of the distinguished Republican leader if I would agree to delay action on that matter until Tuesday; have the cloture vote on Tuesday, and take it up thereafter. I indicated my willingness to do so, and am prepared to do so at this moment, provided the other interested parties agree. It is my understanding, I am not certain of all, but I believe most of those contacted on our side are prepared to do so and we are awaiting confirmation from the Republican leader and the administration that they wish to do that.

I think it would be more convenient for the Senators, preferable for all concerned, if we just completed action on reconciliation tonight and then agreed to a vote on the cloture petition at a time certain—I suggest immediately following the party caucuses on Tuesday—and then dispose of the matter at that time.

Mr. PACKWOOD. So, looking at the clock now, absent Nicaragua, and I will check with the minority leader and see what his position is, we will probably finish at 1 a.m.? By the time we count votes, 1 a.m. on reconciliation, and we may or may not go to Nicaragua, depending upon whether or not the majority leader gets consent to go Tuesday?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the answer to the first question is, if all the time is used and if several amendments are offered and consume the time, the estimate of the Senator from Oregon of the time of completion of this bill is probably accurate.

But I do not know that we will use all of that time. I do not know, for example, if any Senators are going to request or demand rollcall votes on any of these matters. So it might be less time, depending upon the circumstances and, I assume, what happens to the motion.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I thank the leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will be pleased to yield now to the chairman of the Budget Committee if he has any further comment he wishes to make on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER].

Mr. SASSER. I thank the distinguished majority leader. I think all that needs to be done now is to allow interested Senators to review these lists and we are ready to get underway at 9 p.m.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Senator.

I am pleased now to ask the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee for any further comments he would like to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN].

Mr. BENTSEN. I would like to say apologies are due no one. What we are witnessing here are some of the most extraordinary efforts I have seen in my years in the Senate. What we are seeing is months and months of effort put together to put this legislation through, and put it together, and then we are seeing cooperation between the leadership of the minority and the majority to see that we move as expeditiously as possible to go ahead and comply with what has to be done on reconciliation. And to see that kind of concurrence and staff work to cut out billions of dollars of items, highly controversial items, is extraordinary indeed, and I congratulate those who participated in the process. I particularly congratulate the majority leader for his efforts from the very beginning to strip this bill.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if the leader will yield to me.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I yield.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to recall that on Saturday afternoon of last week, the Senate adjourned and some of us went trudging home with sort of a sense that this was about as tough as it had ever been around here. Yet I recall that as the Senate completed its work on Saturday, we said to our two leaders, Please try again; please see if you can somehow, even though you have been at it for days, if you can go back into a conference and find some way to clean up this bill to be something we can be proud of and can get behind."

I want to acknowledge publicly, as we all have privately, that our two leaders, Senator MITCHELL and Senator DOLE, along with the leaders of the Finance Committee, the Budget Committee, and a handful of others, have really done us a great service. They have vastly improved this legislation.

More to the point, I hope what we are seeing is not just an extraordinary singular event but the start of a new custom, the start of a new spirit around here when it comes to reconciliation.

Earlier in the day, I visited for a moment with the distinguished President pro tempore, who is the author of the so-called Byrd rule which has served us well in the past, and which, in effect, we are amplifying and expanding here today.

I said, "I hope, Mr. BYRD, what we are seeing is a new custom, a new tradition and, in fact, would it not be a good idea if it became a new rule." I commend that thought for the future, that we will not go back to the old ways but either by custom or amending the Senate rules, that we nail this down tight; that the reconciliation process will not in the future be abused as it was almost abused on this occasion.

For tonight we have plenty to do to pass this bill, but I did not want the moment to pass without acknowledging a debt of gratitude to our leaders for getting us out of the fix we were in and raising us to a standard that we can all repair.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, does the Republican leader wish to comment?

Mr. DOLE. I have an inquiry. Between now and 9 o'clock, can people make statements generally on the bill, not on any amendment, does the majority leader want to wait?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is perfectly fine. If Senators wish to speak, I think Senators should be permitted to speak to the bill to the extent he or she wishes. Does the Senator from Rhode Island wish to address that?

Mr. CHAFEE. I do. Because then when we come back, we will be addressing specific provisions rather than an opportunity to speak generally under the procedure. If we can do that, it is my understanding we are just going out anyway until 9 o'clock.

Mr. SASSER. May I inquire of the majority leader, is it the intention of the majority leader to go out now until 9 o'clock, or is this time to be consumed by Senators speaking on the procedure or speaking on the bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was my intention to go out, not having been aware that any Senators wished to address the subject of the bill generally, but if Senators are desirous of doing so, then I would be prepared for the next 15 or 17 minutes to permit such discussion to occur.

Mr. SASSER. May I say to the majority leader that I am prepared to make some opening comments with regard to the action which we are urging upon the Senate. I assume that the distinguished ranking member of the Budget Committee is prepared to do so also. I was under the impression that the majority leader will make the motion to strike.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I will.

Mr. SASSER. In conjunction with the distinguished minority leader. At that time, perhaps the two leaders will have a statement to make, and my statement and that of the distinguished ranking member would follow theirs.

I am willing to follow the procedure that will be the most expeditious here and get us out as soon as possible.

Mr. DOLE. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I yield.

Mr. DOLE. Apparently there is some waiver authority in the arrangements that I did not know anything about. I have had requests from somebody on this side that we now waive the rural health provisions.

If we are going to start down that road—everybody would like to get everything waived that is not in there. If that is going to be the policy, then we need to have the policy, and if we are going to permit that, I do not see how we are going to have an agreement if people can go around the Budget Committee chairman, the Finance Committee chairman, and ranking members and get a waiver.

I have had a request from Senator GRAMM of Texas to waive the rural health provision. If that is the procedure we are going to follow, then we have to prepare to have a lot of waivers, I assume.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will be pleased to discuss that with the distinguished Republican leader, and I now yield the floor with the understanding that Senators may address the subject. If the chairman and the ranking member of the Budget Committee wish to address the subject of the motion to strike to save time later, why, there is certainly no objection to that on my part.

Mr. President, I will make clear to Senators then that at 9 o'clock, I will seek recognition for the purpose of filing the motion to strike, and the chairman or ranking member, and others who may wish to do so can discuss that and other aspects of the bill.

Mr. DOMENICI. I assume I am in charge on my side and Senator SASSER is on the other side? I think a couple of Senators on my side want to speak for a few moments. We want to be fair and give some time to their side before 9 o'clock. Would the Senator like 3 or 4 minutes?

Mr. CHAFEE. I am going to ask for 5 minutes. It seems to me that the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee and the ranking member will obviously have a chance to address the Chamber when 9 o'clock comes, as I understand it.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island on my time on this side, and then it will be the other side's turn if that is what the Senator likes. Does the Senator prefer to go first?

Mr. SASSER. I prefer to speak after the motion to strike is laid down.

Mr. DOMENICI. Would the Senator like to split the time between now and 9 o'clock, half on our side and half on his?

Mr. SASSER. If somebody wants to speak over here. If I may inquire of the distinguished ranking member, are we going to speak generally on the procedure here?

Mr. CHAFEE. That is what I was going to do.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I just wish to say that in the Senate, occasionally all Senators do join together in an effort to rise above what can be seen as self-interest and to take the high road. I believe that that is what we are on the way to doing this evening.

The amendment before us will strike any provision in the budget reconciliation package which does not bring in additional revenues or does not reduce spending. Others have explained and will explain this amendment in considerable detail, so I will not take up the body's time to do that now, but I do want to make a couple of points that I believe are important.

What we are doing tonight is right and in the interest of everyone here. Many of us have worked hard over the past few months to include in the reconciliation bill matters that are of deep concern to each of us. I speak as one of those Members.

There are many provisions in the Environment and Public Works portion in the Finance Committee packages about which I feel strongly. I admit to having some fear as to the ultimate fate of those provisions if they are not included here. But the Finance Committee, I believe, for too long has accomplished too much of its business each year through the reconciliation process. I think that is unfair to the majority of the Members in the Senate. It is always unfair to the public, I believe, because our policy decisions may not always be the best, but when they are included in the reconciliation measure, of course, it is accompanied by a limited time and all of the provisions that are applied to so much of the debate around here are not there.

Some have lamented that stripping down of this package signals the death of many important policy initiatives. I do not agree. In fact, I believe the opposite might be true. I am optimistic that our actions today are the first step toward a better tax and a better health policy, for example. Those are issues that we deal with in the Finance Committee, and I hope they will lead us as a committee to begin to act as I believe the committee should, by carefully considering and passing legislative initiatives separately and by allowing the full Senate the opportunity to consider those initiatives in a broad and considerate and deliberative manner.

I am particularly optimistic about the health care policy issues and the implications about the actions we are taking tonight. In the United States, we spend more than $500 billion a year on health care. That is $1½ billion every single day of the year, more than any other industrialized country in the world, as a percentage of GNP at a cost of a far greater amount in actual dollars.

Yet dissatisfaction with this system, our health care system, is growing by leaps and bounds. There are 36 million Americans with no health care insurance, and many of them are children.

The cost of health care is leading to labor problems. Companies are finding it difficult to keep up with the increases in the cost of insurance all across our Nation. If we act today to strip the measure of these health policies, indirectly it will be assisting them because I believe all of us will now begin to act on individual proposals with the careful attention and thoughtful views of each Member. With our actions tonight, we will affirm the principles for which the Senate stands. No longer will issues of tremendous importance to the Nation be hidden under the protective coat of reconciliation. The protections afforded reconciliation measures on the Senate floor supercede all other rules of the Senate. They prevent us from acting as a truly deliberative body.

So, Mr. President, I believe we should go forward with the course set this evening by the distinguished majority leader and our leader on the Republican side. It may not be easy to swallow what we are being asked to give up in this bill. Every one of us is giving up some measure about which we deeply care. But when the dust settles, I believe we will be proud of what we have done. I am optimistic that we will restore the Senate to its role as the protector of those with minority views.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON].

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks that have just been made by Senator CHAFEE. The fact is that this Senator and others are giving up many important pieces of legislation we had hoped could be attached to this particular measure, but that is not possible given the circumstances which now confront the Senate and with the sequester coming up on Monday next. I am not happy with the whole budget process, but we voted this measure out of the Budget Committee, of which I am a member, the other day. I voted for it only with the understanding that I reserved the right to make my final determination on the floor of the Senate.

It seems to me, Mr. President, as difficult as this is going to be for all of us, it may set the record straight; it may send the message loudly and clearly to each Member of this body, each committee and subcommittee of the Senate, that we have drifted and drifted and drifted to the point that we come down to only one or two massive bills each year and we begin hanging all kinds of ornaments on that massive bill, not unlike the manner in which you might hang ornaments on a Christmas tree.

That is not, in my opinion, the way the Senate has traditionally enacted legislation. It seems to me, Mr. President, as difficult as this is going to be tonight, it has to be done. I hope that if nothing else comes out of this, we will realize that the reconciliation structure is supposed to be a means to restrict spending. This bill does not restrict spending, unfortunately, as much as I think it should. Therefore, I suspect, with some shortcomings and with some grave reservations that I have, I will be placed essentially in the position of most of the Members of this body that we must move ahead with this piece of legislation, as bad and unacceptable as it is, as far as deficit reduction is concerned.

Another way to put that, Mr. President, would be as bad as this is, it is still better than nothing. Therefore, I hope that we will move ahead with the motion to kill most or all of the extraneous measures on this piece of legislation and then quickly dispose of any amendments that are offered thereafter.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition?

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader is not on the floor at this time. It is my understanding that he intends to offer the motion to strike at 9 o'clock. So I would suggest the absence of a quorum to be charged equally against both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

OMNIBUS BUDGET RECONCILIATION ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 9 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 1750, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1750) entitled the "Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989".

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate on the bill is limited to 3 hours to be controlled by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI].

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the majority leader, Senator MITCHELL.

AMENDMENT NO. 1004

(Purpose: To strike all matter from the bill that does not reduce the deficit)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for myself, Senator DOLE, Senator SASSER, Senator DOMENICI, Senator BYRD, Senator BENTSEN, and Senator PACKWOOD, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL), for himself, Mr. DOLE, Mr. SASSER, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. BYRD, Mr. BENTSEN, and Mr. PACKWOOD, proposes an amendment numbered 1004.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The text of the amendment is printed in today's RECORD under "Amendments Submitted.")

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the purpose and effect of this amendment may be summed up in a single sentence. The purpose of the reconciliation process is to reduce the deficit. I repeat, the purpose of the reconciliation process is to reduce the deficit.

The amendment is lengthy, consisting of many pages, words, and numbers, but it has that fundamental objective. As I said when I addressed the Senate a week ago Thursday, the reconciliation process has in recent years gone awry. The special procedures included in the Budget Act as a way of facilitating deficit reduction items became a magnet to other legislation which is unrelated to the objective of reducing the deficit.

No useful purpose will be served by attempting to trace the history of that development. We are all familiar with it. We have all been participants in it. But it is time now to restore the reconciliation process to its original objective. That is what this amendment does. It asks sacrifice of every Senator. It asks discipline of every Senator. It asks that the regular legislative process be restored to the dignity it once had.

I urge all Senators to join in supporting this amendment. I urge all Senators to join in helping us engage in meaningful action on the deficit. I urge all Senators to join in opposing any effort to restore provisions that may be stricken by this amendment.

We can act decisively, we can act responsibly, we can exhibit discipline, and we can exhibit restraint if we so choose.

That opportunity is now before us. I urge every Senator to participate in taking up that challenge.

I hope every Senator will support this amendment. I encourage every Senator to support this amendment. I urge every Senator to support this amendment.

Mr. President, I am now pleased to yield to the distinguished Republican leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN). The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, first I thank the majority leader, and I thank all my colleagues.

Mr. President, we have been doing a lot of negotiating. I guess negotiating—we had a lot of meetings, had a lot of discussions, marched up and down, backward, forward, and I guess the longer we had negotiations the clearer it became to many people that we had an opportunity here that we should not let pass.

The bottom line, as I see it, is discipline. Do we have the will to be responsible, to really reduce the Federal deficit or do we undercut the process by piling on important programs, taxes, and other legislative goodies that cost the taxpayers millions in the name of deficit reduction? Many of these provisions have never even had a hearing, never had a hearing, and not one witness from anyplace came in to testify for or against most of the provisions.

I do not believe the American people share the view that maybe some of us do on the floor. I will confess nice little things I have in the bill are gone. We have heard a lot of talk lately about good government, and we are all for good government my Republican colleagues and my Democratic colleagues. I say as far as my Republican colleagues are concerned I think it was their commitment and conviction that helped lead us to this moment, and to this agreement. I will tell you precisely what happened.

We had a caucus yesterday afternoon about 1:30. At that time all the focus had been on capital gains, and it is a very important provision. I will say more about that in a moment.

But I must say many of my colleagues said unless we can clean up the reconciliation bill they were going to find it very difficult to support any capital gains or anything else.

So they in affect directed the leader to have the staff put together something that went beyond the Byrd rule; something that extended—I guess you would call it an extension of the Byrd rule. So I asked the staff, the budget staff, to put together a package because the message I had from nearly everyone in the room is they really wanted to strip down the reconciliation package—not half way, not part of the way, but all of the way.

So while some wanted good government, some wanted better government, and that is what our caucuses I think on both sides of the aisle have been telling us, the leaders, the past couple of days.

So I congratulate Senator DOMENICI, Senator ARMSTRONG, Senator PACKWOOD, and many others on this side of the aisle for their leadership during this tough challenge. And I am certain accolades could go to their counterparts on the other side, as well as to the distinguished majority leader for his cooperation and communication. His door was always open. He demonstrated that, above all, the institution must work, and it is working.

I think the distinguished President pro tempore, Senator BYRD, said it probably best on Sunday when he said the only reason we really exist as an institution is for a couple of reasons. First, we have the right to amend, and we have the right to debate. The reconciliation process was, in effect, destroying us as an institution. So you think about that over the weekend. It makes a lot of sense.

I have no quarrel with the House. They have different rules. They are a different body. I am very proud to have served in the House of Representatives.

Let me also say there are many worthwhile items being stripped out of the bill. A lot of the materials in the Senate program, that 12-pound, 15-ounce package there, were good programs. They were good for Kansas, good for America. But I guess in the final analysis we all decided this was not the place for all of those good programs.

For example, there is a rural health care package, which the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee and this Senator and others have worked hard on to design. I have already had a request—can we not waive that, can we not sort of get that in there. Nobody will ever know the difference. Just put it in there.

You cannot do that. As I understand the agreement, there are critical and long overdue reforms in the physician reimbursement programs under Medicare. Additionally, the hard-pressed independent marginal oil producers were given relief by this bill. I guess the more important thing is how do we return to the normal legislative process, which has gotten out of hand the past 8 years, and which everyone in this body has been probably guilty of to some extent in some areas. Certainly this Senator has, and I am certain others have.

I believe the proposal such as the rural health care package and others are meritorious in their own right and can withstand the test of the normal legislative process, and they should. Reducing the deficit is a priority; the deficit keeps climbing, and we have not had much success in getting it down. I am not certain everybody in America understands all the inside baseball that goes on around here, whether they understand reconciliation and conference committees and motions to strike, but I do believe the American people recognize responsibility when they see it, and tonight they are seeing responsibility in action.

That is the whole purpose of this amendment. The authors will oppose any effort to add back individual provisions, and I certainly urge our colleagues to support those efforts. That does not mean that a provision that some Senator might have—and I will speak to this side of the aisle—will not be picked up in another revenue bill or in a separate piece of legislation. We are not here to pass judgment on what Senators may have in mind as far as legislation is concerned. On this package, it is going to be a reconciliation bill in the finest sense of the word.

Finally, let me say a word about capital gains. Let me be very clear; the President of the United States and his leader in the Senate have not retreated 1 inch in support of this critical tax reform proposal, nor has anything changed its status in this Chamber. The votes are here, I believe, the majority; we think we have the votes, and we think the leadership on the other side has the process. The process means 60 votes. We do not have 60. We have well over 50. Capital gains does have a clear majority, a clear bipartisan majority, and I believe it is an item that is good for America, and I believe Republicans and Democrats will work together to get capital gains reform this year.

We do not have today, enough votes, as I have indicated. We cannot beat the majority on procedural votes, and many colleagues on the other side, for reasons that are probably very good, have decided to stick with the leadership on procedural votes. I have learned how things work here. If you are in the majority, you control pretty much the flow of legislation and what happens.

I do believe we have come to understand that we have a majority, so we are putting aside capital gains today, but I can promise my colleagues on both sides of the aisle who support the effort, and the President, that we will be back ready to win, ready to let the majority prevail on this matter at the earliest opportunity. There are going to be a number of opportunities.

Finally, I say again that I commend the leadership on both sides, particularly the budget leadership and the Finance Committee and others who have a rather active role to play in this entire debate. I believe we have made the right decision. No one could predict precisely what may happen on the House side. It seems to me that if we stick together, as we are doing here, in the conference, that we can have a great impact on what may happen. I think it would be the intent of the distinguished ranking Republican on the Budget Committee to move to instruct the conferees at the appropriate time.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. SASSER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chairman recognizes the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER] and advises he controls 27 minutes.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, with this amendment we are firing a shot, I believe, for fiscal responsibility, a shot that I think will be heard throughout the corridors of this Congress. I believe it will be heard at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, and perhaps may even be heard as far away as Wall Street, which this evening, I think, is in dire need of some good news. With this amendment, we are putting a deficit reduction bill back in the category of being a deficit reduction bill. It is an amendment that sets this body's priorities straight.

What we are seeking to do is to remove from this reconciliation vehicle, all extraneous matter, everything that does not either reduce Federal spending or raise Federal revenues will be stricken. That is the purpose of a reconciliation bill. Extraneous matters have been accumulating on these reconciliation bills now for a number of years, to the point that they are on the verge of sinking the reconciliation bill, and in so doing, defeating the budget process.

At some point in the not too distant future, if we continue down the path that we have been going, the Parliamentarian, on a point of order, will be forced to rule that a so-called reconciliation bill is not a reconcilation bill at all, that it is simply a vehicle for so much extraneous matter that deficit reduction has become a subordinate and wholly incidential purpose for which a so-called reconciliation bill will be offered in the future. I do not say that to impugn the worth of many extraneous matters on this reconciliation bill.

We heard a lot of debate yesterday. It was pointed out by some of our colleagues, in a somewhat disparaging way, that this is a vehicle for looking after the interest of kiwi fruit farmers or those who raised a certain type of vidalia onion.

I want to say to my colleagues tonight, there are an awful lot of very worhty measures being carried by this reconciliation bill, matters that are critical and crucial in importance to the environment, like doing something about chlorofluorocarbons that are poisoning the very globe on which we live; an important provision for doing something about wetlands that are being destroyed in Louisiana; and authorization for essential air services, rural health provisions, Medicare provisions. It goes on and on.

So there are many worthy things on this reconciliation bill, matters that I would vote for, if they were not being presented on this particular bill, indeed, matters that I would speak for on the floor of this Senate. But when we started out yesterday, we had a reconciliation bill that consisted of almost 1,400 pages, with over 250 items that were purely extraneous, and that reconciliation document should have consisted, Mr. President, of only 100 pages.

I want to commend the majority leader and Senator BENTSEN on our side of the aisle, who have worked so hard to strip this bill clean, and also the distinguished President pro tempore of the U.S. Senate, Senator BYRD. Last Thursday, when the majority leader, Mr. MITCHELL, offered the idea of stripping this bill clean on behalf of myself and Senator BENTSEN, we did so on the hope that there would be a majority here in the U.S. Senate who would take a stand on behalf of the integrity of the process.

What we are seeing right now, I say to my colleagues is something of a phenomenon. After months and months of work in the various committees of the U.S. Senate producing worthy legislation that ended up on this reconciliation instrument, we are seeing these same committees come forward and voluntarily striking this extraneous matter. I think in the interest of fiscal resonsibility and in the interest of a sound budget process and, I might say, in the interest of safeguarding and refurbishing the institution of the U.S. Senate. That ought to be grounds for celebration if we can do that here this evening on a bipartisan basis.

I would venture to say that most Americans who even heard the phrase "budget reconciliation" over the past few days or weeks, think budget reconciliation stands for some kind of forum for discussing the capital gains tax. That is how it has been played out in the media and that is how I initially think it was conceived in this Chamber.

But the U.S. Senate, I think this evening, Mr. President, is acting in the finest traditions of this body. I commend the distinguished majority leader, the distinguished President pro tempore, Senator BENTSEN, those on my side of the aisle who have worked so long and hard on this bill. I commend our distinguished minority leader, and certainly this could not have occurred this evening without the cooperation, suggestions, and energy of the distinguished ranking member of the Budget Committee from New Mexico, Mr. DOMENICI.

It is my deep hope that this evening those in other locations in this city who may have seen budget reconciliations in another way and those who might have sought to subordinate the deficit to another agenda will think long and hard about this bipartisan action that has been taken this evening by the U.S. Senate.

I think it is fair to say that the House of Representatives needs to understand that we must work toward a clean bill in conference. That is absolutely imperative if we are going to minimize the negative impact of the sequester that is looming over us.

Let me make this point here, and I think it is very important. We are estimating that this totally stripped down reconciliation vehicle will produce some $50 billion in deficit reduction over the next 5 years. That compares to the $29 billion, we were going to get out of the 1,350-page document that we began with yesterday morning. In short, this action, I think, moves us decisively to bring this budget more nearly into balance. It moves us decisively toward our Gramm-Rudman targets both for this year and in the years ahead.

I think most importantly, it moves us decisively toward the kind of fiscal soundness and fiscal order that we must have if we are to maintain the economic strength of this Nation of ours.

Mr. President, I urge all of our colleagues to support this motion to strike that is before us this evening, and I yield now to the distinguished ranking member of the Budget Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Mexico and informs him that he has 21 minutes under his control.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Let me first say to Members on our side that I cannot thank them all this evening by name. There are only a few present but there are so many who rose to the occasion and caused this to happen. Clearly, a frustration has begun to set in about this process.

There are a few things about the U.S. Senate that people understand to be very, very significant. One is that you have the right, a rather broad right, the most significant right, among all the parliamentary bodies in the world to amend freely on the floor. The other is the right to debate and to filibuster.

When the Budget Act was drafted, the reconciliation procedure was crafted very carefully. It was intended to be used rather carefully because, in essence, Mr. President, it vitiated those two significant characteristics of this place that many have grown to respect and admire. Some think it is a marvelous institution of democracy, and if you lose those two qualities, you just about turn this U.S. Senate into the U.S. House of Representatives or other parliamentary body.

Over the last few days, much has been said about the failure of our budget process. I call everyone's attention to the fact that Budget Act provides for a motion to strike. It was there from the very beginning on reconciliation.

I say to my good friend, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the Byrd rule came along to try to minimize what we put in reconciliation. But the motion to strike was there from the beginning. The process did not fail. We failed. Today, we do not fail, because processes without the will are useless. Today, we are using a process and hopefully in about 35 minutes, we will exhibit our will to use the process.

I say to anyone here who is critical of the evolution of reconciliation and the budget process, the motion to strike was there last year, the year before, the year before, and since we started. But only this week, did it finally dawn on large numbers of U.S. Senators that if we did not stop this, there would be no freestanding revenue measures to vote on in this place. There would be no authorization bills to speak of, no Medicare reform. We can go on for every important issue. Who will bring them to the floor if they can wait until there is a reconciliation instruction and include everything and anything you desire in a committee.

Mr. President, that is the rule of the U.S. House of Representatives. If the House Rules Committee clears a bill, it makes no difference to them whether it is on reconciliation or freestanding. They set the rules for debate in that institution then and there. We do not have that. The only rules committee we have is the floor of the U.S. Senate and a relatively new one called reconciliation.

Today we have met the enemy. As Pogo says "We met the enemy and he is us." We are going to use the process available under the Budget Act to strip from this bill not only those matters which the Parliamentarian would call extraneous but also those which were never intended because they are not pure deficit reduction matters. Thus, they are broader than the Byrd rule, irrelevant and extraneous, and we are going to strike them.

Mr. President, let me suggest that there are a couple of other reasons we ought to do this. There are some who say let the sequester fall. Come the 16th it will start. There are some who are saying, "We hope you do not do anything." I am not one of those. I think the planned train wreck of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law was there to be avoided. It was there to be avoided by rational decisionmaking and I think we ought to avoid it by rational legislation.

If we go to conference with this measure, and the House measure which is much beyond this 13-pound bill, it will probably take 3 to 7, maybe 8 weeks in conference. I say to those who are here we have never had a reconciliation come out of conference sooner than 4 weeks except one time and it was a very, very small one. Most took 7 and 8 and 9 weeks.

I hope the U.S. House of Representatives wants to get rid of the sequester as badly as we do. If they do, clearly that conference will be a short one. They will understand that they can run all those measures through their Rules Committee. They should seriously consider a stripped down bill that will knock out the sequester next week. Then we can go about our business about passing the appropriations bills and get on with the business of the Senate.

Mr. President, as far as capital gains, the Senator from New Mexico believes this is the best approach to assure capital gains and assure an up-or-down vote in this Senate. Clearly sooner than later, because of our action on this measure, we will need a revenue measure on this floor. We need to extend the research and development tax credits and many other things, so we need a tax bill.

I am very hopeful we will get one. That will be good for the Senate. It will be good for our processes. If we need Medicare and Medicaid reform, it will be good to have them on the floor of the Senate, not in the body of a 2,000- or 3,000-page bill.

I believe with that, plus short-term and long-term debt extension, the will of Senate is going to be worked on capital gains. It could not on this bill because of the complexities of the process and the leadership of the majority.

I close by saying I hope none of the Senators who have provisions in this bill that are being stricken think that the Senator from New Mexico is against them, against their provision. I hope we are not being arbitrary. I think we have tried our very best. I think the distinguished chairman and ranking member of Finance have been extremely fair in their bill as has everyone else. I think those who have matters that are important will get their chance in due course. We may have an awful lot more legislation on the floor, but I think that is the way it ought to be.

With that, I wish to thank the chairman of the Finance Committee and the ranking member, and obviously the chairman of the Budget Committee, and the two leaders. We are doing something significant tonight for the U.S. Senate, but most of all for the people of this country we are getting $14 billion worth of deficit reduction in the first year, 1990, and, I say to my friend from Oregon, $56 billion over 4 years. That is what this bill does.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I have discussed this with the managers and the distinguished Republican leader. So far as we know, no Senator has requested a rollcall vote on this amendment. Unless some Senator does so request, it is my intention that we will act on this amendment by voice vote. If any Senator has an amendment he or she wishes to offer they should be on notice to be present to offer it soon, because if there are no further amendments after this, the time will be yielded back and we will proceed to a final vote on reconciliation by rollcall followed immediately thereafter by a rollcall vote on the cloture motion on the Nicaragua Elections Act. That is our plan as of this time.

We hope to be able to complete action on this amendment by voice vote, then proceed to any others which may be offered. If there are none to be offered, then proceed to final passage by rollcall vote followed immediately by a rollcall vote on the cloture motion.

Mr. DOMENICI. Might I say to the majority leader, I will confirm this with Senator DOLE. He told me a minute ago to the contrary on the rollcall vote on this amendment, unless he has just talked to you.

We are OK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I yield such time on the amendment as the Senator from Texas may consume.

Mr. LEAHY. Will the Senator withhold? I just want to make sure I understood this on Nicaragua. Did the majority leader say that we would or would not go forward on Nicaragua tonight?

Mr. MITCHELL. We will go forward tonight.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, let me join with the others in what I think is an extraordinary effort on the part of the leadership on both sides of the aisle in moving forward to strip down this reconciliation bill.

When you are chairman of a committee, you have the responsibility to work within the rules that are given to you. That is what we did in the Finance Committee.

But I have long disagreed with the trend that I have seen taking place with respect to reconciliation and the limitations on debate and amendments that are a part of that process. So I am supportive of this effort. But let no one think that we do not have a job left after tonight is over.

Extraordinary change? Let me show you how extraordinary it is. Here is a table displaying the spending items, these items amount to millions of dollars in spending. These were the spending items the Finance Committee included in its reconciliation bill.

Now spending items on reconciliation can be listed on one page.

Lest anyone think that there is not a job still to be done for the people of this country, let me tell you about some of the things that were struck. We deleted a rural health package, what I think is the finest piece of legislation for rural health care that we have had before this body in many years. Rural hospitals are closing around the country, and they need our help.

Major improvements in health care coverage of pregnant women, infants and children were also struck. Fundamental reform in the way physicians are paid under the Medicare Program—struck. Months and months of work went into those reforms.

Extensive improvements in mental health benefits under the Medicare Program and numerous income security provisions designed to address the needs of disabled children and children in foster care were also struck.

Provisions that would let people on Social Security earn more money without suffering a deduction in their Social Security benefits under the Finance Committee approved bill, to retirees who work could earn about $5,500 more than they would be able to earn under current law.

Those are some of the major provisions that we have struck.

We are striking the IRA. I think expanding and restoring the IRA is terribly important to the average family in America to take care of their retirement, to buy that first home that is becoming more difficult for young couples all the time, and to take care of that college education that was struck.

I understand the controversy with the capital gains. And I am one who has supported capital gains time and time again in the past. But I must tell you I felt a lot more enthusiasm for lower capital gains taxes when the top rate was 90 percent and then 70 percent and then 50 percent. Then we agreed to cut the top rate for people earning the most money all the way down to 28 percent. And part of the argument by the Reagan administration was that we could afford to cut that tax rate on ordinary income because we would save $22 billion over 5 years by increasing the rate on capital gains income from 20 to 28 percent. And then we get the interesting figures from this administration that we will save $16 billion over 5 years if we will bring it down from 28 percent to 15 percent. They still haven't explained that one to me.

I am talking about some important things, too, on the revenue loser side. I am talking about repeal of section 89 that was passed by a vote of 99 to zip, 99 to 0, in this body. I am talking about mortgage revenue bonds, that had 86 cosponsors; low-income housing credits, that had 72 cosponsors; extension of the research and development credit, that had 53 cosponsors; and extension of the targeted jobs credit with 36 cosponsors. Those are some of the things we are going to have to come back to in this body and that is what I hope we can do early on in a revenue measure. And the House is pretty sparing in the number of revenue measures that it allows us.

Now let me talk about the other body just for a moment, because one of the problems we face is going to conference with the House. Will our House colleagues understand what we have done and the steps we have taken to try to get back to the proper use of reconciliation? Will they give us credit for trying to make real progress in reducing the deficit or will they sit there with all the House approved provisions as bargaining chips while we sit there with none?

Well, I must tell you, I am much encouraged by a statement made today by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

It says:

I commend the Senate for passing a clean budget reconciliation bill. Three months ago, on July 12, I urged this exact course of action in the House. Unfortunately, in July and again in September, the Administration rejected a clean reconciliation bill, referring to pursue a misguided capital gains cut for the wealthiest Americans.

In July and again in September, I predicted that to go beyond a clean reconciliation bill invited deep divisions on controversial and expensive issues such as capital gains, catastrophic health insurance, child care and section 89. To my regret but not my surprise, those divisions materialized in the Ways and Means Committee and the floor of the House of Representatives. The reconciliation bill—a bill whose purpose is to reduce the budget deficit, however marginally—turned into a political football that actually will increase the deficit in a few short years. It was for this reason that I voted against the bill both in committee and on the House floor.

Although I am encouraged by the Senate action, it is uncertain whether a clean bill can be achieved in the upcoming conference with the Senate. The bill passed by the Senate appears to reflect only an "institutional" agreement within the United States Senate. The position of the Administration and the House Republicans is unknown. Even Administration support for a "clean" reconciliation bill is largely irrelevant, particularly to House Republicans, as we learned when the House passed, over the Administration's silent objection, amendments relating to catastrophic health insurance and section 89.

In addition, House conferees would not be prepared under any circumstances to accept a "clean" bill whose provisions are devised and defined by the Senate alone. Important differences will remain over the basic $5.3 billion revenue package and the $2.7 billion

Medicare savings—differences that can only be resolved in a conference with the Senate.

Nevertheless, I am hopeful that a truly clean bill can be achieved through the normal give and take in the upcoming conference with the Senate. As desirable as the result would be, however, I will not be party to any "side deals" or private understandings regarding the debt ceiling or a subsequent legislative "vehicle." In the face of a $130 billion deficit, I remain committed only to the achievement of responsible and real deficit reduction. I have no interest in the political games and avoidance of responsibility that have marked the Administration's budget policies up to now.

He goes on to say how much he is encouraged by the Senate action and how much he hopes that the Senate's action can assist the other body in bringing about real deficit reduction. Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI's encouraging response, and I know he is sincere in his statement that he is going to do his best to try to bring about a deficit reduction bill.

But the job that we face in trying to see that we preserve the reconciliation process in conference will be formidible.

Let me make another point. I have heard some comments, too, about how many amendments are included in the measure reported by the Finance Committee.

If we use the gross numbers there, the bill raises $37 billion and spends $29 billion over 5 years. Those are the figures that have been cited. Let us put that in context.

The Joint Tax Committee did revenue estimates of the tax part of the fiscal year 1990 budget that the Bush administration submitted in February of this year. The Joint Tax Committee's estimates reject the proposition that the capital gains tax cut is a big long-term money gainer. And once we go through those estimates of the Joint Tax Committee and count the outlay savings in the same way the Finance Committee did, the Bush tax proposal raises $34.4 billion over 5 years in taxes, but spends $52.1 billion on new tax breaks.

Consider that, and then they have lost $17.7 billion over 5 years.

When I compare that with the Finance Committee's product before we stripped this bill, a gain of over $8 billion over 5 years, the Finance Committee did not do a bad job. So I think it is important that we put these things in perspective, to see what we will be facing in the weeks ahead as we review these things and present them to this body, which I am committed to try to do in as short a time as we can reasonably do it.

Once again, an incredible transformation has taken place through the contribution of Senators like the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia; and the chairman of the Budget Committee, the Senator from Tennessee; and the ranking minority member, Senator DOMENICI from New Mexico; and the majority and minority leaders. I think this is as dramatic a change as I have seen in a piece of legislation since I have been in this body. I hope we can put it through and accomplish its objectives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have three Senators on my side who desire to speak: Senator GORTON for 3 minutes, Senator RUDMAN for 5 minutes, and Senator COHEN for 3 minutes. And I believe that is about all the time I have.

In whatever order the Chair would recognize them, I would yield them that much time at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is recognized.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I join with my colleagues in congratulating our distinguished leaders and the chairmen and ranking minority members of the Budget and Finance Committees, together with the other Members of the U.S. Senate who, this evening, have joined together to cause the U.S. Senate to deliberate and to work as it ought to work. In fact, it is deliberating and working in the way it ought to work in two distinct ways.

First, we are doing what we ought to do. As the distinguished majority leader said earlier during the course of this debate, the purpose of a reconciliation bill is to reduce the budget deficit. It is certainly clear this bill, if this amendment is passed, will do so only modestly. It is certainly clear our task next year will be even more difficult than it has been this year.

But it is also true that this reconciliation bill, if this amendment passes, will reduce the budget deficit, consistent with the budget resolution which we passed earlier this year and with the budget agreement involving the White House and both Houses of Congress. It, therefore, represents both responsibility and progress.

Second, and equally important, by this course of action this evening we are not doing what we ought not to do. The distinguished minority leader pointed out that many of the extraneous elements in this resolution before this amendment include good legislation.

From a brief review of that legislation, I know this Senator agrees with well over half of those pieces of substantive legislation. But all of them, whether this Senator agrees with them or not, share one feature in common: They have not been debated on the floor of the Senate and cannot be effectively debated as a part of a reconciliation bill. They cannot effectively be amended as a part of a reconciliation bill.

Thus, their inclusion, whether they are good, bad, or indifferent, would utterly destroy the very purpose of the Senate of the United States, as so eloquently described by the President pro tempore last Sunday. It is absolutely essential that, even with this legislation, we have the right to debate and the right to amend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. GORTON. I urge we agree to the amendment and pass the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, let me add to what has been said very briefly about the majority leader, the Republican leader, and the leadership of the U.S. Senate who participated in bringing this reconciliation bill to us tonight in the form in which it was presented. It is, really, a monumental achievement, as we look back over the several years. It was aided greatly by the foresight of the distinguished President pro tempore, who promulgated the Byrd rule.

I would say it was informally advanced beyond the Byrd rule by what we have now adopted. I guess I would call it an informal Dole-Mitchell-Sasser - Domenici - Packwood - Bentsen amendment which simply said: If it does not raise revenue or save money, we do not want it in here.

I wish the distinguished President pro tempore might offer that as a formal amendment. It would save us a lot of grief in the coming years.

Mr. President, there ought to be a lesson in what happened here today and yesterday and last week. This all started when the distinguished majority leader suggested that this had gone too far. The Republican leader that night, and others, joined in that and has brought us to here.

It has taken too long. Here we are, several days into the new fiscal year, still not having set the budget process in concrete. We must go to the House of Representatives in conference if this passes. We have an interesting situation from a bargaining point of view. We have nothing to bargain with, which is the way it was planned.

We are going there with a clean reconciliation bill and we are simply saying: If you do not want that sequester to continue beyond next Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday, either join us, or it will continue to run.

But we should not have taken so long to get there. And we ought to have learned something collectively, all of us here. That is, and I have heard the distinguished President pro tempore say this in meetings of our committee: We spend far too much time on a process which was designed to be somewhat more efficient than it is. We wait until the very end of the year to get these appropriations bills passed, if at all. Many have yet to be conferenced.

The net result of that, Mr. President, is what the distinguished President pro tempore said on Sunday about this body, which has the ability to debate and amend and consider legislation. I will tell my colleagues, if there is a great disappointment to this Senator in my 8 years here, it is that some of the most important issues we can discuss we never have the chance to debate and amend on this floor because we are totally immersed in this budget process from January to December; maybe this year shorter.

So I hope, Mr. President, we might learn from what we did this year, that next year we might come to an early agreement with the administration, if that is possible; we might move in a manner unlike past years, and, hopefully, have an opportunity to debate other legislation which is of vast importance.

The distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee ticked off a whole series of legislation which needs serious attention on the floor. We cannot give it that attention if we spend our entire lives debating appropriations, budgets, and reconciliation.

I hope maybe this year we have finally learned the lesson. I am not sure that we have, but I hope we have.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. SASSER. Yes, I will yield to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, as the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire just pointed out, the House has many extraneous matters in their bill. One relates to a matter within the jurisdiction of my committee. It involves the Tongass National Forest. It is a vitally important bill, one of the top matters on the environmental list of virtually every environmental organization in the United States.

My question is, What is the advice of the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee?

Are we to understand that there will be no bargaining with respect to House measures which are nongermane, which are extraneous?

Mr. SASSER. I say to my friend from Louisiana, that will have to be determined once conferees are appointed and once we enter into a conference with the House of Representatives. We received some encouragement that the House themselves may engage in some ex post facto stripping of their own reconciliation bill.

I say to my friend from Louisiana that this process has proceeded with the majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, conferring on a daily basis with the Speaker of the House of Representatives, Mr. FOLEY. I think the distinguished Senator from Louisiana was off the floor a moment ago when the Senator from Texas read into the RECORD a recent comment, I think this afternoon, of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, commending the Senate for stripping our bill and indicating that perhaps there would be some movement on the House side in that regard.

To sum it up, I would say to my friend from Louisiana, we are going to have to proceed as we can and just see what occurs.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask the question in this sense: We can go to conference and bargain, as we usually do, and I have a lot of sympathy for a lot of the provisions in the House bill, I want to tell the Senator. But I do not want to go in there and take a tough line and say no bargain on this thing and be an ogre in the environmental community when I believe that they have a lot of justice on their side. On the other hand, I do not want to waste a lot of time if the Senate is going to make up its mind that we are really not going to go with these kinds of amendments.

I think we ought to decide here tonight, and the distinguished minority leader just gave me some language which someone is going to put on to instruct, nonbinding language. I would like an expression from the key leaders here what we are really going to do when we get to the House. I, for one, would feel pretty bad about having lost what I think is a very good provision here, lost to purity, only to lose our purity when we get over in conference.

Mr. SASSER. That is a point well made, and I think we will just have to plow that furrow when we come to it, I would say to my friend from Louisiana, but I am hopeful we will find perhaps some of our House colleagues have some of the old-time religion by the time we get to conference, also.

Mr. President, I yield such time on the amendment to the distinguished President pro tempore as he may consume.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the distinguished Senator that there are 3 minutes remaining on the time.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, would it be appropriate at this time to indicate that if the distinguished President pro tempore should consume more than 3 minutes—and I anticipate that he will—that we can yield such time as he may consume off our portion of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REID). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, John Stuart Mill said, "On all great subjects, much remains to be said." This is a great subject, the reconciliation bill, and much remains to be said. The hour is late. I would not impose on the patience and time of my colleagues were it not, in my judgment, a moment worthy of comment from me.

I have seen the Senate many times when it gave me reason to be concerned about its future. I have also seen it on some occasions when it gave me reason to be proud. One such occasion was when the Panama Canal Treaties were approved. I knew then how difficult it was for the Senators on both sides of the aisle to rally to support the approval of the ratification of those treaties. Senators did it in the face of tremendous opposition from all over the country, but they arose to the need of the moment, and I think that they wrote in large letters the character of the U.S. Senate.

Tonight I think that we should pause to reflect upon this institution to which Gladstone, that great English statesman who lived during the long reign of Queen Victoria and who was Prime Minister of England four times, referred when he spoke of the U.S. Senate as "that remarkable body, the most remarkable of all the inventions of modern politics." That is what this institution is. There have been 1,792 men and women who have served in this body since its beginning in 1789, and every Member of this Senate ought to reflect upon that, and it is not too much to say that Senators who serve in this body are a chosen people, a body of 100 Members, like the early Roman senate which was made up of 100 nobles, and later 200, later 300. Sulla increased the number to 600 and Caesar to 900, and Augustus brought it back to 600.

There have been other senates. The senate of Sparta. Lycurgus, the lawgiver, is remembered. The first and most important institution that he created was a senate made up of 28 senators whose purpose it was to keep the authority and power of the kings within proper bounds.

The U.S. Senate is the centerpiece of the great compromise. It is the masterpiece of the men who wrote the Constitution. They had all of the history of their English forebears and brethren and the history of other European parliaments before them. They knew very well the experience of Englishmen who had by the sword and with their blood wrested from monarchs over the centuries the prerogatives and the rights of Englishmen and the prerogatives and the rights of Parliament. They also had the colonial experience. They were wise men, and they saw the need for a system of checks and balances, and the Senate was the balance wheel of that system. The Senate was given extraordinary powers: judicial powers, the power to try the highest officer of the Government; executive powers, the power to approve the ratification of treaties and to approve nominations; and investigative powers. But the basic cement that was the very foundation of this balance wheel were two in number, the right to debate and the right to amend. The other body may amend, but the other body may also issue a rule which, if agreed to, will confine amendments to one in number or two in number or three or none and direct that a certain Member will be the only Member who will offer that one amendment or those two amendments.

The House has the previous question, but not the Senate. The Senate allows unrestricted debate. We now and then restrict ourselves through the cloture motion, which first was created in 1917. But the right to debate and to amend is why we should be proud of this institution, why we should revere it.

The Constitution, in section 7 of article I, says that measures that raise revenues shall begin in the House of Representatives, but it also says that the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills. So there is a constitutional right reposed in the Senate to amend even revenue bills.

The Senate and the House have their tensions between them, as do the executive and the legislative, all these with the built-in tensions that the forefathers took great care to fashion in order to make this a system of checks and balances.

But in the reconciliation bill, we were about to inflict our own mortal wound, as Cassius did with the same dagger that he had plunged into Caesar's blood, bringing a bill of such magnitude here which contained scores of measures, on any one of which the Senate should have had the opportunity to debate at full length and to amend. What hidden pieces of legislation might come to the floor in a package of this size? What hidden legislation we might vote upon and come to regret at a later time?

This is an institution for the protection of minorities, an institution in which the minority can put a bridle on the majority for at least a while until the country can be awakened to the mistakes that might otherwise be visited upon the people. We should not view this Senate lightly, and never should be party to weakening this institution, with which we have been blessed.

Yes, there were limitations on debate in 1919 in the League of Nations debate, and in 1926 in the World Court debate, limitations through the cloture rule, but their price was substantial concessions by the majority.

The Senate is the forum of the States. There is no other forum in this Government where the States stand as equals—little Rhode Island stands equal to Alaska or California or Texas or New York—the only forum in which minorities are protected against the sudden waves of passion that might sweep over the Nation.

A reconciliation bill is a super gag rule, the foremost ever created by this institution. Normal cloture is but an infinite speck on the distant horizon when compared with a reconciliation bill. Cloture may be invoked on any measure, motion, or matter. Sixteen Senators sign a cloture petition; parts of 3 days transpire before cloture is invoked; and when it is invoked, it is invoked on only one matter or one measure or one motion. Then there are 30 hours of debate. The provision is within that rule that that time may be extended by a three-fifths majority vote to whatever—40 hours, 50, 75 or 100 hours. But not so with reconciliation. Reconciliation comes to the floor. There is no opportunity to debate a motion to proceed, whereas, under cloture, an attack can be made by the minority even on the motion to proceed. The minority ought to be zealous in protecting that right; the minority may be on this side of the aisle tomorrow, as it was yesterday.

Under reconciliation there is no motion provided to extend that time beyond 20 hours, but there is a motion that is nondebatable and can be invoked by only a majority of Members to reduce the time, and it can be reduced to 10 hours or to 5 hours or to 2 hours or to 1 hour without debate. Only a majority vote is needed to reduce it to no time:

Mr. President, I move that the time remaining on reconciliation be reduced to no time. What can you do about it? Weep. Reconciliation is one real beartrap.

And so it has been with sorrow that some of us have seen what has been happening on reconciliation. It is a process which has gotten out of hand and, if continued, it will undermine the deliberative nature of the institution.

It is a process by which committees of the Senate may dictate to the Senate. You take what we give you. There is not a thing you can do about it. Oh, yes, you can strike. But you take what we give you.

And within those committees that determination is made by a majority. There is a 17-member committee, and 9 members of the committee can determine that. Send that to the Budget Committee, and the Budget Committee has no alternative but to send it to the Senate, and here we are faced with a super, super, colossally super, gag rule.

So we ought to take the utmost care in handling this legislative weapon.

Mr. President, I have had my faith renewed in this institution in these recent hours. I compliment the majority leader. He has the toughest job in this town. He cannot fire any of us—not any of us. We can dare him to try. He has the toughest job.

I compliment the minority leader. These two men had to work together, and we have witnessed some real statesmanship in their work. I knew it was here before today.

I have seen LLOYD BENTSEN before when he has faced tough assignments and when he has also said, "I will do my best."

The same can be said of JIM SASSER, one of the bright young men that I have seen come to this Senate and take the Senate to heart. We ought, like Paul, to be stricken blind for a moment that we might see revealed in the bright light of truth, what this institution is.

Yes, there were important measures wrapped into this reconciliation bill. But I hope that this is the beginning of the end of the abuse of the reconciliation process. I hope that it will be a lesson learned by all of us that we might in the future take heed, and remember not to put that measure that is so dear to our hearts into the reconciliation package. I hope the other body will take the action of this body to heart as well. They ought, too, to experience joy in this moment because, after all, the Senate is one of the two Houses of the Congress—the people's branch.

Mr. President, I close by saying, as I began, that human ingenuity can always find a way to circumvent a process. And reconciliation is a process. It has been abused terribly. But I have regained my faith. We are told in the Scriptures:

> Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set.

The Constitution is the old landmark which they have set. And if we do not rise to the call of the moment and take a stand, take a strong stand against our own personal interests or against party interests, and stand for the Constitution, then how might we face our children and grandchildren when they ask of us as Caesar did to the centurion,

> How do we fare today?

And the centurion replied,

> You will be victorious. As for myself, whether I live or die, tonight I shall have earned the praise of Caesar.

I not only compliment, but I also thank Members who have risen in this moment to do the responsible thing. We are going to look back on this day. So when you go with pride to meet the other body in conference, go with strong hearts, with confidence, and a determination that you are going to uphold the principles that our forefathers, men of this institution, stood for. Yours is an equal body—the Senate.

When Aaron Burr walked out of the Old Senate Chamber on March 4, 1805 after he had sat in the chair, and presided over the impeachment trial of Supreme Court Justice Samuel Chase—Burr had killed Alexander Hamilton in a duel at Weehawken, NJ. He sat in that chair as though nothing had ever happened. Warrants had been issued in the State of New Jersey and New York for his arrest. But he presided over that trial with a degree of fairness that was commended by friend and foe alike.

As Burr bade goodbye to the Senate over which he has presided for 4 years, this is what he said. And I close with his words because I think they may well have been written for a moment like this. He said:

This House is a sanctuary; a citadel of law, of order, and of liberty, and it is here—in this exalted refuge—here, if anywhere, will resistance be made to the storms of political phrensy and the silent arts of corruption; and if the Constitution be destined ever to perish by the sacrilegious hands of the demagogue or the usurper, which God averts, its expiring agonies will be witnessed on this floor.

[Applause. Senators rising.]

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, when I stood here 8 nights ago to make the proposal that has led us to this moment, I could not have foreseen and did not foresee what would occur.

But if nothing else had occurred, the difficulty of the past 8 days, particularly for those handful of us who were involved in it throughout, would have been worth it for the privilege and the opportunity to have heard the words of the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate this evening, one of the most remarkable persons who has ever served in the U.S. Senate, and I might say, who has ever served the U.S. Senate.

On behalf of every Senator—and although the occasions are rare in which I feel I can speak for more than one Senator, on this one I feel I can speak for 99 of them: Thank you, thank you. We appreciate the Senator's words, his presence, and the privilege of serving with him.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, Senator DOMENICI has given 3 minutes to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, let me add just two words to the comments made by my colleague from Maine. It has been said that words are but the empty vessels into which we pour the meaning of our minds.

I say there are few in this Chamber that can match the President pro tempore and his command of words, his deep reverence for history, and for his love of this institution. I believe that we are all grateful beneficiaries for the meaning of your mind.

Justice Holmes once said that we cannot live our dreams. It is enough if we can give but a sample of our best and know in our hearts it has been nobly done.

On behalf of my colleagues, certainly on this side, and I believe the other as well, the Senator has given a sample of his best, and in our hearts, we know it has been nobly done.

Mr. President, I do not have the historical background of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia. But I came to Congress in 1972, and at that particular time, President Nixon was involved in the impoundment process. At that time, he accused Congress of engaging in irresponsible spending. It was, if I can borrow Hemingway's phrase, a "movable feast" that he was faced with every single year, and he impounded the budget.

There were some in Congress that believed President Nixon should have been impeached for his impoundment policies. Fortunately, wisdom prevailed, and there were no articles of impeachment on impoundment, but, rather, it served as the impetus for the construction of the Budget Act itself in which this process called reconciliation was an integral part.

Unfortunately, if you can show me a reform, I will show you a scandal deferred. We had political action committees that came in as a basic reform to the contribution system back in the early seventies. Today it is being attacked as being scandalous in operation. The same thing has happened with the reconciliation process.

I want to pay tribute not only to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia but to two other people in this Chamber tonight—three, but he is not here, I will mention him in absentia—both of my colleagues over here, PHIL GRAMM and WARREN RUDMAN.

A lot has been said about the Gramm-Rudman bill. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI recited in a statement he made earlier, and also in an article in the New York Times today that every criticism of Gramm-Rudman is true. "It is mindless. It is an abdication of the President on the part of the President and Congress."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 2 additional minutes off the bill.

Mr. COHEN. "For all of its faults, Gramm-Rudman has one thing going for it. It can result in more real deficit reduction than we will ever achieve in the budget reconciliation bill."

He wrote this article before the action was taken today. Nonetheless, what he pointed out under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings—I understand the Senator from South Carolina would like separation from Gramm-Rudman—$16 billion will be saved in the first year and $80 billion over 5 years, compared to the reconciliation bill that the House had to pass, that would provide for $16 billion over 5 years and a growing deficit thereafter.

The process had become abused. I think we owe a great deal of credit to, and we would not be here tonight if it were not for the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act. It has forced us to do that which we are required to do, and that is to measure up to our responsibilities. I think we owe a great deal of thanks to our three colleagues of the Senate for forcing us to do what we have an obligation to do.

It has been said on television today by a respected businessman that the stock slide this afternoon was attributed to the news about the postponement of capital gains. I must say that I find that incredible to accept. The heart of our problem is not that we do not have enough preferential treatment for capital gains, but we do not have enough preferential treatment for fiscal responsibility.

This action that we are taking tonight is the first step in a long time that we are taking toward fiscal responsibility. So I want to commend all of my colleagues, the majority leader, minority leader, and all who have been involved in this process for the courage demonstrated in measuring up to meeting those responsibilities.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has 2 minutes, 44 seconds remaining.

Mr. DOMENICI. Do I have time remaining on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, has all my time expired on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Maine.

The amendment (No. 1004) was agreed to.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time on the bill?

Mr. SASSER. How much time is remaining on the bill, Mr. President, may I ask?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has 35 minutes; the Senator from New Mexico has 1 hour.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I know of no amendments on our side.

Mr. LEVIN. Will my friend from Tennessee yield on that issue?

Mr. SASSER. Do I yield for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. LEVIN. I had intended to offer an amendment, and I will do something other than that, if I can be yielded 3 minutes.

Mr. SASSER. If the Senator can do something other than that, I am pleased to yield.

Mr. LEVIN. I see the Senator from Missouri is on the floor. He can help me.

Mr. SASSER. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I had intended, along with Senator SYMMS and Senator LIEBERMAN, to offer an amendment to strip from this bill a new tax on amateur radio operators. We have never before taxed ham radio operators, ever. They are volunteers who perform a valuable public service at no cost to the public. They help us in times of national emergencies, including tornadoes, hurricanes, and earthquakes. They do it on a volunteer basis. I do not think that anybody in this body actually intended to initiate a new tax on these ham operators, but the bill before us does have, for the first time, several fees from $35 to $105 on ham radio operators.

I was going to introduce an amendment to strike these fees. I understand the reasons the leadership does not want this bill open to amendment; it would open another kind of floodgate which they want to avoid, and I can respect that. On the other hand, I think that if we were voting on this amendment under ordinary circumstances, that the managers of the bill for the Commerce Committee would accept this amendment.

I have talked to Senator HOLLINGS, who does not like this new fee. I have had a brief conversation with Senator DANFORTH now, and he can speak for himself. But given the exigencies here tonight, and the resistance to opening up this bill to any amendment, even to strip a new tax, and this would, of course, meet the Byrd rule if this amendment were introduced, I will not offer this amendment, because I believe that the managers of the bill, when they go to conference, will be in a position to take care of this problem.

But it is a problem. There are about 450,000 amateur radio operators in this country; these are volunteers, people who perform their service not-for-profit. They have always been exempted by the FCC from these fees. And I think that the vast majority of this Senate would want to avoid any new tax on these ham operators under normal circumstances.

I wonder if my friend from Missouri might comment on the issue that I have raised.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, speaking only for myself, and Senator HOLLINGS is not on the floor, I understand that Senator LEVIN has spoken to Senator HOLLINGS about this matter and that this is also in accordance with his views. In the Commerce Committee we not only met but we exceeded our instructions under reconciliation.

The amendment in question that was raised by Senator LEVIN is $4 million. We can take care of this and still be over our reconciliation instructions.

But what we have attempted to do in the Commerce Committee is to set up a general user fee scheme for people doing business with the FCC, but we never really focused on the question of the amateur radio operator. So as a matter of policy and also a matter of dollars we would be prepared to work with the Senator from Michigan. This is, of course, on the assumption that we do in fact go to conference with the House. If there is a conference with the House I want to assure the Senator from Michigan that I will do everything I can to work with him and I believe that we can drop this particular matter from the legislation.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend from Missouri.

Mr. President, the Commerce Committee has chosen to impose unprecedented fees on the amateur radio operators to help meet our reconciliation targets.

The proposed budget reconciliation of the Commerce Committee provides for approximately $43 million in additional revenues to the FCC supposedly to cover the FCC's administrative costs in licensing radio services. $3.78 million would come from new fees charged to amateur radio operators for the first time.

The proposal assesses $35 for the following categories: new license; modification of license; renewal of license; reciprocal permit for alien amateur license; renewal or modification of amateur club, RACES, or military recreation station license; special temporary authority; and a $105 fee for a request for a waiver.

Current law specifically exempts the following radio services from licensing charges: local government, police, fire, highway maintenance, forestry-conservation, public safety, and special emergency radio. These radio services are not the subject of the Commerce Committee's proposal. In addition current law states that the FCC "may waive or defer payment of a charge in any specific instance for good cause shown, where such action would promote the public interest."

To date, the FCC has, under this waiver provision, exempted other public service efforts from licensing fee requirements, including amateur radio operators and public broadcasting.

Earlier this year, the FCC provided at Congress' request, a list of licensing fees—many of them new—that would raise significant moneys for purposes of reconciliation. The fees were supposed to reflect the actual administrative costs for the licensing. The bulk of the estimated fees for the amateur radio operators were no more than $5, and the FCC said explicitly that it was not making a recommendation that such a fee be imposed.

However, the Commerce Committee chose to raise $3.78 million of the $43 million required, from fees on amateur radio operators, through fees for above the $5 cost estimated by the FCC and even though they continued to exempt public broadcasting as well as the other public service efforts already exempted by law.

Such a fee for amateur radio operators is unfair and unwise.

The amateurs perform a valuable role for our Nation in public safety, disaster relief, and emergency communications for national defense, among other services. The amateurs were the vital link in communications during Hurricane Hugo, earthquakes in Mexico and El Salvador, and—in my own backyard—the 1987 Detroit metropolitan disaster.

Amateur radio operations serve as an excellent educational tool for our young children. They demonstrate the excitement and practical rewards of applied science. Amateur radio operations also provide a tremendous source of pleasure and pride to handicapped and retired individuals.

Amateur radio operators serve as an important but unofficial link to the rest of the world—allowing informal and directly personal communications between persons of widely divergent cultures—an Australian farmer and a Boston engineer. One enterprising American even communicated for a lengthy period of time with a Soviet cosmonaut orbiting the Earth. Such relations bring a tremendous advantage to our overall efforts of world peace and friendship.

Moreover, the amateur radio operator community already administers much of their administrative burdens, including conducting their own licensing examinations on a voluntary basis. It has been estimated that the amateurs have saved the FCC $1 million a year from 1983 to the present by administering their license examinations on a voluntary basis.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the FCC, as I said before, has indicated that the $35 proposed fee is significantly higher than the administrative costs these fees are designed to recover. In effect, therefore, a sizable portion of these fees is really a tax.

Amateur radio operators perform similar services to the radio services that are already exempt from such fees by law. They are intimately involved in issues of public safety and disaster relief, and they work without profit. In fact, amateurs pay for their own equipment. If we are to address their work in any way, it should be with praise and thanks, and not with new charges.

Mr. President, if I had offered this amendment tonight, it would not have caused us to exceed the reconciliation target, because the Commerce Committee reported, and this bill includes, save $12 million in excess of the target.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment I had intended to offer be printed in the RECORD at this point and that the letter to me of Mr. George Race the Michigan section manager for the American Radio Relay League, Inc. be printed in the RECORD following the amendment.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In the material under the caption "Private Radio Services" contained in the "Schedule of Charges" to be prescribed by the Federal Communications Commission, in section of title III, strike the following:

7. Amatuer license:

a. New license (per application)	35.00
b. Modification of license (per application)	35.00
c. Renewal of license (per application)	35.00
d. Reciprocal permit for alien amateur license	35.00
e. Renewal or modification of amateur club, RACES, or military recreation station license	35.00
f. Special temporary authority (Initial, modifications, extensions)	35.00
g. Request for waiver
(i) Routine (per request)	105.00
(ii) Nonroutine (per rule section/per station)	105.00

THE AMERICAN RADIO RELAY LEAGUE, INC.,
September 27, 1989.

Senator CARL LEVIN,
Russell Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LEVIN: I am writing in regard to House Resolution 3299. Introduced into the House on September 20, 1989, this bill contains a license fee proposal that will have a financial impact on the more than 500,000 Amateur Radio operators across the nation.

These Amateur Radio Operators provide a volunteer radio communications service to Federal, State, County and Local Government. Many nonprofit organizations are also served as well. Reliable primary and secondary communications links are provided where and when needed. This service is absolutely free! Federal Communications Commission rules strictly prohibit compensation, of any kind, for services rendered.

Amateur Radio communications is often the first and only link with the outside world when disasters occur. It is ironic that as HR-3299 was being introduced into the House, Amateur Operators were providing emergency communications in the wake of hurricane Hugo. Still other Amateur Radio Operators were preparing for Hugo's arrival at our Southeastern coastal areas. As I write this letter, hundreds of Amateur Radio Operators are handling Health and Welfare messages to and from the Caribbean and our own devastated coastal areas. Others are working in the disaster areas, providing primary communications for Police, Fire, Emergency Management, Red Cross and Salvation Army operations. Using their own equipment, without remuneration of any kind, these volunteers give freely of their time and expertise in service to others.

When President Bush speaks of a better and kinder Country through voluntarism, he is speaking of the heart of Amateur Radio. We are "amateurs" only by virtue of our volunteering of time, skill and equipment. We are professionals when it comes to Emergency Communications in service to our Nation.

As the elected representative of Amateurs Radio Operators in Michigan, I ask that you act in our behalf to prevent the passage of any Bill that will have a financial impact on our hobby.

Sincerely,

GEORGE RACE,
WB8BGY ARRL Michigan Section Manager.

ALBION, MI.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I commend Mr. Race not only for his efforts as one of our Nation's hams, but for his thoughtful and articulate letter on the unfairness and inappropriateness of these fees.

Mr. President, I would also like to point out that in addition to Senators SYMMS and LIEBERMAN, Senator DODD would have cosponsored my amendment.

TAXES ON LANDING AND TAKE-OFF RIGHTS AT HIGH DENSITY AIRPORTS

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise to join my colleagues from the State of Illinois, New York, and New Jersey who are among 15 of us opposing one provision by the Senate Commerce Committee in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990. This provision would raise a minimum of $239 million in new revenues from only four airports, O'Hare, La Guardia, Kennedy, and Washington National from a slot fee on landing and takeoff rights of the air carriers serving those airports.

The slot fee was adopted without public notice or a formal hearing by the committee with jurisdiction over taxes or by the Senate Commerce Committee to consider its consequences. Large payments averaging $70,000 per slot per year will be paid by the carriers and will be deposited in the general fund for budget reduction purposes.

These costs will be passed on to passengers at the four airports, but will not be paid by passengers at competing airports. Worst of all there will be no direct benefits to those passengers, the carriers, the airports, or their host cities, nor will it serve as a solution to other problems of capacity, safety, or airline competition.

One carrier at Chicago O'Hare, United, will be charged up to $55 million and a second carrier, American, more than $45 million. Air Wisconsin, a regional airline serving O'Hare will pay $3.5 million pushing its fares above those of its competitors not paying slot fees.

This slot fee is being imposed at a time when Chicago O'Hare Airport, lacking Federal discretionary funding assistance, has increased its debt burden by over 4,000 percent over the past 6 years. The airlines are now contributing a 433-percent increase in terminal rates and a 14.5-percent increase in landing fees there.

The Federal Aviation Administration is authorized to establish the slot fees based on the value of each slot to its holder. Yet the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here in Washington, DC, in 1976, ruled that an agency may include only those direct and indirect costs it incurs in conferring a special benefit on the recipient in a case brought by the National Cable TV Association against the Federal Communications Commission. It may not charge the recipient for expenses incurred in serving an independent public purpose.

The value of these slots to the carriers is based on the revenues and profits of each flight. In the same case I just cited, the circuit court ruled that an agency cannot calculate its fees on the basis of the return on investment or profit to be derived by the recipient as a result of the benefit. Otherwise the agency is unlawfully attempting to levy a tax rather than charging a fee.

A serious ripple effect on U.S. carriers serving overseas markets is another impact not fully considered when the slot fee was adopted. The U.S. Government has historically supported cost-based fees on U.S. carriers landing abroad. That objective will be difficult if not impossible to achieve if this additional value based tax is imposed on foreign carriers using the high density airports.

Traffic has grown at other large and medium sized commercial airports as well as at the four high density airports that will not have to pay a slot fee. Other airports experience the same kind of delays that tie up traffic at the high density airports. Thunderstorms, heavy snow, hazardous winds, and poor visibility occur throughout the system.

In Chicago, traffic is also delayed by inadequate airline control facilities and personnel. After airline controller operational errors, they climbed from 5 in 1987 to 28 in 1988, I sponsored a bill, enacted into law, that requires the Federal Aviation Administration to produce and carry out a plan to bring the Chicago airline control system up to standards that provide for peak period travel. That is expected to require several years to implement.

We can no longer build or even expand airports in many large cities where the service is needed the most. An airport is an unwelcome neighbor. Yet if these central cities are to remain in the mainstream of the national and global economy, air carrier service must not only remain intact, but make the fullest and most efficient use of the airport capacity that is already there.

I am very grateful for the excellent work of the Senate Commerce Committee in its oversight of aviation safety and service and airport development during the decade following aviation deregulation. I agree that the issue of allocating landing and takeoff rights between new entrants and incumbent carriers remains, and the issue of increasing the capacity of the airline control system must also be solved. This proposal does not address these problems, nor is it fair to cities whose airports will now have to compete with others not paying the higher costs.

AIRPORT SLOT FEES

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, let me first take this opportunity to commend the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. HOLLINGS, and all members of his committee, for complying with the difficult obligations under budget reconciliation.

I must, however, express my deep concern over language in their reconciliation package that raises $239 million through fees imposed on landing and takeoff slots at the Nation's four high density airports—Kennedy and La Guardia in New York, Washington National, and Chicago O'Hare International.

This proposed fee is discriminatory in that it would be assessed against only four airports, as well as the carriers and passengers using those facilities. Such a proposal would give carriers that serve airports other than the four in question a direct competitive advantage.

O'Hare Airport in Chicago is hit hardest of all by this provision. It is estimated that the fee will average over $70,000 for each landing and takeoff slot. With 1,668 slots, O'Hare's cost alone will be over $120 million. That means O'Hare will have to pay over 50 percent of the total cost.

O'Hare and its airlines make the largest contribution to the airport trust fund of those user fees already imposed by the Federal Government, yet rank a low 21 out of the top 24 airports on return of Federal discretionary dollars. In other words, O'Hare is already paying in more than other airports to the Federal Government, while getting back less.

O'Hare has nonetheless pressed forward with $2 billion in capital improvements, with only 1 percent of the funding from Federal sources. This has caused O'Hare's annual debt service to increase 4,239 percent in 6 years; terminal rental charges have had to increase 433 percent and landing fees 14.5 percent to cover the increased debt.

The proposed slot fee will further aggravate the cost discrepancy between O'Hare and non-high-density rule airports, and may encourage some airlines to move their operations elsewhere.

The most immediate consequence will be an increase in air fares for all flights in and out of O'Hare. Higher air fares will make O'Hare less desirable as a hub transfer point and will result in passengers seeking cheaper alternative routings which avoid Chicago. Ironically, this Government-imposed penalty on Chicago passengers will result in increased fares at the same time Congress is focusing attention on the desirability of lower air fares.

Furthermore, the proposed fee is to be value based. That fact will force airlines to achieve the maximum yield from the use of each slot. This means airlines will be forced to drop marginally profitable short-haul lines, such as those serving downstate Illinois communities, and transfer the use of such slots to long-haul, larger aircraft which can support the increased cost of a per-seat-mile-based slot assessment.

Given the discriminatory nature of the slot fee proposal, and the adverse impacts it will have on the affected airports, this type of Federal action must be more fully reviewed before being implemented as part of budget reconciliation.

I therefore urge the conferees to reconsider this matter in conference, and refrain from imposing such fees.

Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, I would like to raise a specific concern I have about this bill with regards to an action taken by the Commerce Committee.

In its reconciliation package, the Commerce Committee included a provision to institute airport slot fees at the four airports that were designated as high density by the Federal Aviation Administration [FAA] in 1968: National Airport in Washington, DC, La Guardia and Kennedy Airports in New York, and O'Hare Airport in Chicago. This provision is designed to generate $239 million in revenues in fiscal year 1990.

While I certainly appreciate the difficult decisions faced by each committee in meeting its reconciliation instructions, I am disappointed in the Commerce Committee's decisions to include this particular provision. The imposition of airport slot fees would have an immediate, significant adverse economic impact on the air carriers that operate slots at these four airports. The eventual effect of these fees is likely be an increase in air fares and a reduction in services and routes offered by affected air carriers.

To accomplish the $239 million revenue goal, the average fee per slot per year would have to be approximately $70,000. Let me explain the probable impact of this on United Express, a carrier based in Wisconsin that serves 21 cities, among them Chicago. United Express operates 50 federally allocated air carrier slots at O'Hare Airport. Imposition of these fees at this rate would mean an annual additional operating cost to United Express of $3.5 million. Their estimates indicate that, to offset this cost, they would need to add an additional 3,500 passengers per year. That is a very significant increase in the regional market that United Express is operating in.

Mr. President, no hearing has been held on this proposal by the Commerce Committee. In addition, it is questionable whether the language adopted by the committee constitutes a fee proposal or a tax. A fee implies a return for services rendered by the Federal Government. Yet there are no additional services provided to air carriers at the four high density airports, and no special services provided to carriers in possession of slots.

The high density rule was instituted by FAA in 1968 to minimize air traffic congestion at heavily used airports. However, the rule now—21 years later—is decidedly outdated. Other airports not covered by the rule are equally congested. The purpose and design of the high density rule needs to be reexamined, and I hope that the Commerce Committee will consider doing so in the near future. However, until there is some revision to the rule, the imposition of airport slot fees on carriers at these four airports is completely arbitrary and unfair to the carriers involved.

Mr. President, there are many reasons not to support this bill, this being just one. And I will not support this bill. While I do not intend to offer an amendment to strike this provision, I am hopeful that this language will be dropped in conference, the House-passed bill having no similar provision. It is an arbitrary action, and one that would endanger the economic viability of many air carriers, which is neither wise given the current volatility in our domestic airline industry nor in the best interest of the air traveling public. I hope that my colleagues will join with me in urging conferees to reject this provision.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, do any Senators wish to offer any additional amendments at this time?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SASSER. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Let me repeat what the Senator said. If anyone wishes to offer an amendment—I am not going to say they are going to pass—now is the time to do this. They have 30 minutes.

We made an agreement we are going to defeat any amendments, so I hope there are none on this side.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SASSER. I yield to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am one who through the day asked for time to present my amendments. My staff and I have gone over the leadership amendment. It is fair and balanced. There is no reason for us to offer amendments. We have been treated equally. I had three amendments I was going to offer. I have no amendments in this bill after the leadership amendment is adopted.

In interest of complying with the request of the leadership and the distinguished President pro tempore, I do not offer them.

I congratulate them on the procedure and congratulate them on leaving the time available in case it was needed.

Mr. SASSER. I thank the Senator from Alaska for his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The distinguished majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it appears there are not going to be amendments. We will, therefore, be proceeding shortly to a rollcall vote on final passage of the reconciliation bill and immediately thereafter on the cloture of the Nicaragua Elections Assistance Act. Therefore, Senators who are not now on the floor or on the Hill I hope are being alerted by their offices so that they can return and be present for the vote.

We had previously, I believe, through both Cloakrooms, notified Senators votes were imminent. I know many Senators are not present on the floor. So I merely take this opportunity to give Senators a few moments' notice so that all Senators who are not present can be notified by their offices and return to the Senate because we have two rollcall votes coming up very shortly.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, may I inquire how much time in total is remaining on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has 27 minutes; the Senator from New Mexico has 58 minutes.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico is prepared to yield back his time, we will be prepared to yield back our time on this side of the aisle. And we do not want to work a hardship on any Senators who may be some distance away, but I will say to the distinguished majority leader that I think he announced an hour and half ago we were going to have a rollcall vote on this measure. They should have had adequate notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I might say to Senators on this side I have heard from none of them that have any amendments. We are ready to yield back very shortly. I hope if anyone has any amendments they will call it to our attention.

I yield to my friend Senator SYMMS.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I say to my dear friend if it were not for the responsibility that the leadership is exerting here on both sides of the aisle this Senator would have several amendments on this bill, but I am going to restrain myself.

FOREIGN REPORTING REQUIREMENT MODIFICATION

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a letter I have received this evening from Treasury Secretary Nicholas F. Brady, on the increased reporting and compliance measures by U.S. taxpayers which are controlled by foreign entities—section 6403 of the Senate bill.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, October 13, 1989.

Hon. STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR STEVE: Thank you for your letter of September 27, 1989, regarding section 11403 of H.R. 3299, the 1989 Revenue Reconciliation bill. As you know, that section provides for increased reporting and compliance measures by U.S. taxpayers which are controlled by foreign entities.

I appreciate your comments. We have heard a great deal about the impact of these provisions on international trade and investment and understand the significance of the concerns you raised.

We support the goal of developing appropriate procedures to increase compliance with U.S. tax laws by foreign-owned U.S. entities. Nevertheless, we recognized that overbroad rules in this area could unduly burden taxpayers and discourage trade and investment. For this reason, we have worked closely with Hill staff to clarify and refine the House-passed provision.

As it stands now, in the form reported by the Senate Finance Committee, we believe the provision is intended to ensure that the recordkeeping requirements and penalties imposed on foreign-owned companies are no different, in general effect, to those imposed on U.S.-owned companies, recognizing the unique tax administration problems present where information pertinent to a U.S. tax examination is controlled by non-U.S. persons. This intent is consistent with how Treasury intends to exercise its regulatory authority under the provision should it be enacted.

In this regard, we note that the Finance-reported bill and Committee report reflect the following differences from the House bill:

1. The requirement that the foreign owner appoint the U.S. taxpayer as its agent is clarified so that such agency is limited to an appointment solely for purposes of summons enforcement under the Internal Revenue Code and not for any other purpose of federal or state law.

2. The disallowance rules which automatically eliminate deductions and the cost of goods sold in transactions between the U.S. taxpayer and its foreign owner are replaced with Treasury authority to value such deductions and costs, at its discretion, on the basis of available, credible information.

3. Provided it is clear that deductions and costs can be valued at Treasury's discretion on available information when a taxpayer fails to maintain required records and to make them available at Treasury's request, it is unnecessary to require that records generally be maintained in the U.S. The bill, therefore, grants Treasury broad regulatory authority to specify, limit, or eliminate the categories of the records to be maintained in the U.S. and to enter into individual record retention agreements with a taxpayer modifying the general rules in appropriate specific cases.

4. If records are, under regulations, required to be maintained in the United States they will not be required to be translated until the time specified in Treasury regulations which we expect would be when the records are requested.

5. Treasury is authorized to disregard certain de minimis failures in applying the penalty provisions.

6. Where bilateral tax treaty procedures are both adequate and practical in their application to protect the U.S. government's interest in a given case, the Internal Revenue Service is expected to use those procedures before issuing a summons to the designated agent.

We will also suggest that the Conference Committee make several additional refinements:

a. that the Statement of Managers clarify that the summons authority in this provision for testimony of employees of the foreign owner extends only to explanations of transactions relevant to the examination of the U.S. taxpayer and documents pertinent thereto and can frequently be satisfied by testimony of employees of the U.S. taxpayer;

b. that the bill and Statement of Managers make clear, as is already clear under the Senate bill with respect to documents that, once persons are present in the U.S. pursuant to a summons issued under the provision or under regulations promulgated under the provision, their presence is intended solely for federal tax enforcement purposes and they will not be subject to legal process in federal or state non-tax litigation;

c. consistent with paragraph 3, above, and the bill as reported by the Finance Committe, that the Statement of Managers clarify that there is no general rule requiring maintenance in the U.S. of records of related, non-U.S. persons, but that, generally, record maintenance in the U.S. would be required under regulations only where there are reasons to believe that such records would not be timely and completely produced upon request; and

d. that the Statement of Managers state that the bill, consistent with Congressional intent and Treasury's intent with respect to regulations, as I describe above, in no way discriminates against foreign-controlled U.S. corporations in violation of any treaties and, therefore, the treaty override "backstop" language in the Ways and Means and Finance Committee reports is unnecessary and, given our common goals under this provision, undesirable.

We would appreciate any assistance you can provide us in working with Hill staff and Conference Committee Members so that the Senate's amendment to these provisons and the further refinements described above are included in the bill produced at Conference.

Sincerely,

NICK.

BOND ARBITRAGE REGULATIONS

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, one of the issues we did not adequately address during Finance Committee markup is the need for relief for State and local government bond issuers from the administrative burdens imposed by the arbitrage rebate requirement of the 1986 act.

The 243-page arbitrage rebate regulations, which provide only partial guidance and are written in a fashion that mere mortals cannot understand, were supposed to clarify for State and local issuers the easy administrative means through which issuers would comply with the rebate requirements.

Even the Treasury Department acknowledges what a disaster these regulations have proven to be and worked on seeking relief during House consideration of the reconciliation bill.

I understand there is much sympathy among the members of the Finance Committee and among the Senate as a whole to fix the problems associated with the rebate requirements. The House attempted to fix the problem but I think their provision is a bit restrictive. Let me elaborate on the problems a bit.

The House bill provides that a rebate is not required for financings in which 75 percent of the proceeds will be used for construction when 10 percent are spent in 6 months; 50 percent in 12 months; 90 percent in 18 months; and 100 percent in 24 months. For many issuers, especially in Northern States like Idaho, public buildings cannot be completed in that tight a time schedule.

I understand that Texas may not have the problem, which Northern States have, of short construction seasons, but it does have restrictive borrowing statutes that run afoul of the House provision. I am sure Texas is not the only State with restrictive borrowing procedures because States are far more sensitive about controlling public borrowing than we are here at the Federal level.

As I understand it, one of the factors State and local governments find so aggravating about the rebate situation is not that they might owe a rebate to the Federal Government—though that ought to be aggravation enough—but that even when they are not earning arbitrage, they have to set up elaborate internal systems or pay high-priced consultants to prove they aren't earning arbitrage and don't owe anything.

We at the National level establish enough mandates that State and local governments must pay for, but which provide a beneficial result, that we should not also be establishing needless and costly bean counting requirements for local governments.

I urge my colleagues who will be on the conference for reconciliation to ensure that we provide adequate relief for State and local governments so they are able to comply with a requirement that shows some public purpose at the Federal level and is workable and sensible at the State and local level.

Please remember that nobody can pour concrete year round in Boise, or any other northern city, so we must not have the Federal law mandate it. In order for my municipalities to be relieved of a needless bean counting procedure, we should establish a 36-month construction cycle. This will assure that they are not pouring concrete at a time of the year when it is unsafe.

I hope our conferees on this reconciliation will be attending to this problem in conference. I will be reminding each Senator at the appropriate time of the needs of the real world in this matter.

TAX ON DOMESTIC OFFSHORE OIL

Mr. President, I rise today to voice my opposition to the new tax on domestic offshore oil and gas production contained in S. 1750, the budget reconciliation bill. This proposal would impose a new wellhead tax of $0.03 per barrel and $0.02 per MCF on all offshore oil and gas production. The proceeds from this tax would be dedicated to fund a program, which has not yet been authorized, for wetlands maintenance and restoration.

While the objective of protecting our significant wetlands is laudable, the funding mechanism is misdirected. Let me outline just a few of the reasons why this proposal is misdirected.

First, this new tax has not received a fair public hearing in the Senate Finance Committee. It was included in the chairman's mark as one of hundreds of tax provisions and adopted without thorough consideration of its impacts.

Second, the Congress has not yet authorized a wetlands protection program into which these funds would flow. This is a clear example of placing the cart before the horse and is an abrogation of established legislative procedure. The authorizing committees of jurisdiction have not yet advanced a wetlands protection program. The proposed tax has not yet received public review in the House and Senate Tax Committees. The Appropriations Committees of jurisdiction have not reviewed or recommended spending levels for the program. None of these steps has been taken.

Third, this tax discriminates against a narrow segment of a single industry. It singles out offshore production of the oil and gas industry. Loss of wetlands is an onshore problem and is not confined to coastal areas or areas of oil and gas activity. The factors contributing to wetlands loss are well documented and include natural subsidence, agriculture, urban expansion, as well as natural resource development activities. Oil and gas activities have been directly linked to only a small percentage of wetlands loss. To suggest that offshore or onshore oil and gas activities should bear the entire burden for funding this program is unfair and without foundation.

Fourth, a tax on offshore oil and gas production creates further competitive imbalances for domestic producers of offshore oil and gas. Proponents of this measure erroneously argue that these additional costs can be recouped by the producer. I suggest to you that because these same producers compete with foreign and domestic oil that is not subject to this tax, these additional costs cannot be recouped and the profitability of offshore development will be reduced. Less profitability may not only affect the economics of future offshore development, but may have the perverse effect of reducing investment in onshore development. Taken all together, our national energy security will be further eroded.

There are many more reasons than I have given in this short time to oppose this tax. But, in summary, suffice it to say that this new tax abrogates established congressional procedures for authorizing and funding new programs; it discriminates against an industry that is only a small part of the problem, it adversely affects the competitiveness of our domestic oil and gas industry, and further jeopardizes our national energy security.

I urge my colleagues to oppose this provision and strip it from this reconciliation bill.

REVENUE BONDS

Mr. President, I would like to call the Senate's attention to an aberration in the application of the ceiling for small issue industrial revenue bonds. The current rule is that the investment limit of $10 million cannot be exceeded for 3 years after the exempt bonds are issued even if the investments are paid for with non-tax-exempt financing. This is based on the idea that if the project expands in less than 3 years perhaps it was not a true small issue in the first place.

I think a serious argument can be made that such a prohibition makes no sense at a time when the United States is competing worldwide for manufacturing facilities. But my amendment does not go that far. The amendment simply says that any capital expenditures with respect to facilities which are not functionally related to the original ones financed by the tax-exempt bonds should not be counted in the application of the ceiling. If a company used industrial revenue bonds to finance a shoe factory last year and now sees an opportunity to assemble VCR's or computers, they should not be precluded from using non-tax-exempt financing to build a facility to do this totally unrelated activity.

I do not believe the drafters of the original limitation ever thought about, much less intended, it to have a negative impact on unrelated manufacturing facilities.

The amendment I hope to include in a subsequent revenue measure has no revenue impact because it does not expand tax-exempt financing. That financing would remain limited by both the $10 million individual cap as well as the overall volume cap. It would, however, allow companies the flexibility to expand into new product lines with their own money and I believe that is good tax policy.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time we have on this side of the aisle.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time. Before doing so I would just like to make one short comment. I notice the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has left the Chamber.

But I did wish to express my appreciation for the splendid address that he presented to the Senate here this evening, and I wish to express my appreciation to him for his kind remarks.

The distinguished President pro tempore does us all a great service in reminding us from time to time that we are Senators of the United States with an obligation and a responsibility to respect and uphold the traditions of this institution.

I know I reflect the views of all my colleagues in expressing our appreciation for his very perceptive remarks this evening.

ORDER FOR TECHNICAL CORRECTIONS

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the staff to make technical corrections to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, the Commerce Committee package as contained in the budget reconciliation bill includes several new FCC fees and several fee increases, including a new common carrier fee for so-called field audits. Since the new fee schedule calls for the imposition of a $62,000 fee for a field audit, it would be useful for the FCC to define specifically what a field audit is and when the fee will be assessed.

The FCC has traditionally sent its auditors out into the field to investigate the financial practices of the telephone companies to make sure that they comply with the FCC's rules. The FCC estimates that it will conduct 15 such field audits in the coming fiscal year.

I am told that once the new fee schedule is enacted, the FCC will conduct a rulemaking to resolve certain key issues concerning these field audits. I ask that the Commission provide detailed answers, through its rulemaking process, to the following questions:

What is the FCC's definition of a field audit? For what kinds of field audits would the FCC assess a fee? Would routine field visits or informal inquiries qualify as a fee-generating field audit?

Some people fear that these new fees will give the Commission an incentive to increase unjustifiably the frequency of these audits. These new audit fee provisions should not be interpreted as a congressional grant of authority for the FCC to conduct audits which would not otherwise be conducted, just because a fee would be collected.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I would like to join my colleague Senator INOUYE, in discussing how the new field audit provisions might be implemented. I commend my distinguished colleague for the relevant and insightful questions that he has asked the Commission to address through its rulemaking process. I am hopeful and expect that the answers to his questions will more precisely define the matter in which the Commission will enforce its authority to conduct field audits and to assess this fee.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to state my staunch opposition to a provision added to this bill which creates slot fees at the Nation's four high-density airports: JFK International Airport; LaGuardia Airport; Washington National Airport; and Chicago O'Hare International Airport. This unfair proposal will place these airports at an immediate, severe competitive disadvantage and will ultimately result in higher fares for consumers.

This amendment was added to the reconciliation bill by the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation in an effort to raise a total of $239 million. The average annual per slot charge to slotowners would be about $71,000 per year. Some individual airline slotholders would be billed tens of millions each year; for example, American Airlines, $48 million; United Airlines, $58 million. Others such as Pan Am, and TransWorld Airlines would owe as much as $13 million and $16 million respectively. For the New York area airports, the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey tells me that about $80 million would be raised from airlines and passengers.

These charges are onerous, geographically discriminatory, and would not yield any aviation benefits to the four affected high-density airports. The $239 million estimated to be raised would simply go back into the pot for general deficit reduction, not into the Aviation Trust Fund. The four high-density airports are not the Nation's busiest airports, they are regionally clustered together, and they do not represent a fair sampling of air carriers serving all airports of similar size. It makes no sense to burden these airports with such heavy charges and not to apply them to Denver, Atlanta, Los Angeles, Dallas, or other airports with high-density traffic patterns. I do not advocate spreading these charges to other airports, but merely point out the inequity in singling out the four high-density airports.

The high density airport traffic rule was created in 1969, when aircraft were smaller and slower, and air traffic control systems were less able to handle increasing traffic. Today, many of the reasons for the rule no longer exist. Of the four high-density airports, only Chicago O'Hare ranks in the top five busiest airports in terms of passengers handled or operations. In terms of aircraft operations, LaGuardia ranks 25th, National 28th, and JFK 35th. Busier airports are not burdened by this rule, or the slot fee proposal. I am not now arguing to delete the high-density rule—although in 1983, the FAA itself proposed to rescind it except for National—or to apply slot fees to other airports, but I believe it underscores the blatant unfairness of this proposal.

These fees are thinly disguised new taxes being used to generate large amounts of revenues for deficit reduction. The proposal discriminates by exempting general aviation and commuter flights, and it does not create a legitimate user fee related to the cost to the Government of providing any service. I strongly urge the conference committee members who will consider this bill to drop this tax provision which is not contained in the House reconciliation bill.

Passenger fares will increase for all flights arriving and departing from the LaGuardia and JFK Airports, as well as from the other two high-density airports. At a time when consumers are complaining about higher airfares, this proposal will drive fares upward. The high cost of the slot fees will force air carriers to achieve maximum yield from the use of each slot. In the case of some short-haul markets which use smaller aircraft—mainly markets in upstate New York—the result will be total loss of service or, most assuredly, loss of jet service. Remaining service is likely to be by smaller commuter aircraft since they are exempt from slot fees.

In addition to my other objections I would like to point out the adverse international implications of this ill-conceived proposal. At a time when the U.S. Government is a party to bilateral air transport agreements which commit the United States to impose only cost-based user charges for international air carrier landing rights, this proposal will put those agreements in jeopardy and will most likely result in the vigorous pursuit of countervailing tariffs by our bilateral trading partners. I have already heard from foreign air carriers who suggest that this proposal will have very negative implications for international air travel.

Mr. President, I urge my Senate colleagues to oppose this provision. If it is considered in a joint conference committee, it is my hope that this objectionable item will be deleted.

PROPOSAL TO IMPOSE FEES ON AIRPORT LANDING AND TAKEOFF SLOTS

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I would like to take a few moments to express my opposition to a provision contained in the reconciliation package before us.

On July 27, the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation approved its reconciliation package, meeting its target of $450 million in revenues or savings. The committee proposed obtaining more than half that amount—$239 million—through the imposition of fees on landing and takeoff slots at the Nation's four high-density airports—Kennedy, LaGuardia, O'Hare, and Washington National.

I am extremely concerned about the discriminatory nature of the committee's proposal. The slot fee would be assessed against only four airports, and the carriers and passengers using those facilities. Carriers serving other airports would receive an immediate and direct competitive advantage created by governmental action. Passengers flying to or through these airports would be subjected to fare increases, based solely on the budgetary process, not on the need to make aviation safety or airport capacity improvements.

Further, the committee proposal provides that the slot fee may be assessed against foreign carriers only to the extent permitted by international law and treaty obligations. Therefore, the fee would also grant some international carriers a competitive advantage over domestic carriers in the same market.

Mr. President, we are all on committees. We all know the difficult choices that must be made in order to meet the targets set in the reconciliation process. I commend the Commerce Committee for struggling to meet its assigned target. But this fee was a choice that should not have been made. But unfortunately, it was made, on a 13 to 5 vote, without the benefit of hearings or wide discussion on the subject matter.

The Department of Transportation is given several guidelines: That the fees can only be applied to the four airports previously cited; that slots of commuter airlines be exempt; that slots held by foreign carriers be assessed a fee only to the extent allowed under the bilateral agreements covering those carriers' entry into the United States; and finally, that the sum total of the fees be at least $239 million in fiscal year 1990.

There was no assessment of what these slots are really worth; no indication whether the committee believed that the right to land at National at 9 a.m. is as valuable, less valuable, or more valuable than the right to land at National at 2 in the afternoon, or at LaGuardia, Kennedy, or O'Hare at 11 at night. There was no signal as to whether or not the committee wanted the airlines to just pass those fees through to the consumer, or absorb those costs. And, Mr. President, there was no provision that the hundreds of millions of dollars raised through these so-called user fees would in any way benefit those paying them. There is no assurance that these funds would be used to improve aviation safety, to expand airport capacity, or to improve the service airline customer receive.

In spite of the many problems with this slot fee proposal, procedural limitations make it difficult to remove the provision from the Senate reconciliation bill. That would require an offset, which could face problems of germaneness. However, the outlook in conference is more promising for those of us who oppose this provision. There is opposition to this proposal among many of our House colleagues. In addition to the concerns about the discriminatory nature of these fees, they believe this is really not a user fee, but a tax.

This matter deserves fuller consideration than it has received to date. The conference with the House will provide a means for review and reconsideration of this proposal. It is the hope of this Senator that the conferees will recognize the problems with this proposal, and not include it in the conference version of reconciliation.

REMOVAL OF THE LOW-INCOME AIDS TREATMENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAM ON PROCEDURAL GROUNDS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I understand the parliamentary situation that we face on reconciliation but I regret to have to remove the Low-Income AIDS Treatment Assistance Program. This program not only provides life sustaining therapeutics to individuals who face both poverty and death, but also advances our public health effort to bring the AIDS epidemic under control. It is clear to public health officers across this country, and to the Labor Committee, that the most compelling incentive for individuals to step forward for HIV testing and counseling is the availability of medical interventions which have been proven to extend life and reduce suffering. This program creates such incentives for low-income individuals for whom available treatments would not otherwise be a realistic option.

The authorization begins a process of cost sharing with States with a significant incidence of AIDS. It will also gather important program data upon which we can make future policy determinations. This program enjoys broad bipartisan support and I am hopeful that it will be swiftly enacted in the days ahead.

I thank the ranking minority member of the Labor Committee for his ongoing support for sound AIDS policy, and all of the other Members of this body who have rallied for this program. In accordance with the wishes of the leadership, I will support removing the Low-Income AIDS Treatment Assistance Program from the reconciliation package on purely procedural grounds, in order to avoid sequestration. Nevertheless, it is my hope to move this critical program forward with all deliberate speed.

I ask that the dear colleague letter concerning this program and the letters of support from a wide array of public health, religious, and governmental organizations be inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, October 2, 1989.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: We write to express our support for the inclusion in the FY '90 Labor/Health and Human Services Appropriations Conference Report of $30 million to extend the Public Health Service grant program to states for AIDS treatment assistance. This program does more than make life prolonging therapies available to low income individuals with HIV disease, it also helps to bring the AIDS epidemic under control.

The availability of effective treatments for HIV is the most compelling incentive for individuals to step forward for HIV counseling and testing. By providing access to treatment, caregivers and public health officials gain a crucial opportunity to deliver AIDS education that has been demonstrated to facilitate behavior change and reduce transmission of the AIDS virus.

Among the many diseases which confront us, HIV is unique because it is both lethal and transmissible, through sexual contact, sharing of needles, and from mother to newborn. AIDS was effectively non-existent in our nation a decade ago and today directly jeopardizes a million Americans. Rationing access to treatment for HIV disease based on the patient's ability to pay would ultimately result in more Americans unknowingly becoming infected—thus increasing the human and fiscal toll taken by AIDS.

Providing federal funds to assist low-income individuals obtain treatment for AIDS and HIV disease is not just an act of compassion, it is a key part of the public health strategy to end this epidemic. We urge you to actively support both funding and renewed authorization for this program.

Sincerely,

AN URGENT MESSAGE TO THE PRESIDENT AND MEMBERS OF CONGRESS FROM STATE COMMISSIONERS OF HEALTH

Please Don't Turn Your Backs "I want all our citizens with HIV infection to know that we are in this fight with them all the way. We are on their side, doing everything we can. We will not turn our backs."—Louis W. Sullivan, M.D., Secretary of Health and Human Services, May 6, 1989.

In recent weeks federally financed research efforts have yielded breakthrough information in the fight against AIDS. In many people who have no symptoms, but who are infected with HIV, the underlying cause of AIDS, early treatment with the drug AZT has been shown to delay the onset of AIDS and to enhance both length and quality of life. The news augments an earlier announcement that the preventive use of the drug pentamindine in aerosol form can forestall the pneumonia that has been the principal cause of AIDS-related hospitalization and death in the United States. For the million or more Americans infected with HIV, this is a time of hope. For too many of them this hope will never be realized—without your help.

Access to treatment will buy precious time as scientists continue to search for even more effective therapies. Failure to guarantee access to treatment will result in needless suffering.

The availability of treatment provides a new opportunity to slow the spread of HIV infection. Those who received ongoing treatment will be in close contact with clinicians and counselors who can help them make profound behavioral changes necessary to interrupt the spread of HIV. Men, women, and adolescents will be given a new reason and new support for considering the importance of prevention.

Developing outpatient services now will enable us to conserve scarce medical resources. If adequate ambulatory treatment is available, unnecessary and costly hospital stays can be reduced.

Congress can act now. The Congress should renew and broaden the drug subsidy program due to expire on September 30. The program was first enacted as an emergency measure two years ago to ensure access to AZT for people with full-blown AIDS. As the recent studies have demonstrated, hundreds of thousands more Americans can now benefit from early drug therapy.

This is an epidemic. It requires national leadership. As Commissioners of Health, concerned about AIDS, we see an unparalleled opportunity for bold policies that can match the strides of science.

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON AIDS

STATEMENT ON THE FISCAL YEAR 1990 APPROPRIATIONS

We, the Members of the National Commission on Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS), strongly support the increased in AIDS funding endorsed by both Houses of Congress and the Administration. While we believe that much work remains to secure adequate funding for the national battle against AIDS, we also recognize the fiscal challenges facing the Congress.

We are particularly pleased that the Senate Committee on Appropriations has increased the total AIDS budget to accommodate humane and cost-effective programs designed to meet the burgeoning care needs resulting from the HIV epidemic. The Congress made clear the priority it places on the health care needs of people with AIDS and HIV in the AIDS legislation that was unanimously approved last fall. Being able to provide access to lifesaving medical treatment to those who face poverty and death is not only a compassionate response to the crisis but a sound public health strategy for bringing the epidemic under control. The most compelling incentive for individuals to step forward for HIV counseling and testing is the availability of effective treatment and appropriate medical care.

The Commission is most invigorated by the task of advising both the Administration and the Congress. It is a responsibility that we accept with great determination. Given the gravity of the HIV epidemic, we are fortunate to have an abundance of sound data on which to base our public health policy decisions. With this in mind, we urge the Congress to be deliberative in its policy-making processes and to resist fragmented approaches to public policy via amendments to the FY '90 Appropriations bill.

The National Commission on AIDS stand ready to review and comment on proposals under consideration by the Congress for addressing the challenges presented by the HIV epidemic.

AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, IL, July 12, 1989.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: The American Medical Association understands that you have proposed a mechanism for the federal funding of AZT. This proposal would provide grants to states so that the cost of AZT could be covered for certain AIDS patients.

As you know, the AMA previously has expressed support for federal funding of AZT for AIDS patients. Recently reported results at the Fifth International Conference on AIDS add to the evidence that the survival experience of AIDS patients taking AZT significantly improves.

The existing temporary funding scheme for AZT has reached the brink of termination on several occasions. This situation is unfortunate for the AIDS patients who would be devastated without continued access to AZT.

The AMA supports your efforts to include a longer-term solution to the problem of funding AZT treatment as part of reconciliation legislation. Your leadership and initiative on this and other AIDS issues is to be commended.

Sincerely,

JAMES H. SAMMONS, M.D.

THE UNITED STATES CONFERENCE OF MAYORS,
Washington, DC, July 18, 1989.

Senator EDWARD KENNEDY,
Chairman, Committee on Labor and Human Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: On behalf of The United States Conference of Mayors, I am writing to inform you of our nation's cities full support for a three year authorization for the Low Income Treatment Assistance Program for AIDS/HIV treatment assistance, and to commend you for your leadership on this issue. Over 250 mayors met last month in Charleston and passed a policy resolution in support of early intervention for the treatment of HIV infected persons. I have enclosed a copy of our policy for your review.

As you know, in the early years of the battle against AIDS, prevention education was the sole tool available to combat this disease. Now, however, with promising new drugs such as AZT and aerosolized pentamidine, hope is available for those infected with HIV, if they can afford the costly treatments.

The funding Congress has twice provided for the AZT treatment program has been enormously helpful in assisting low income persons to obtain this life prolonging treatment. Early indications for the success of aerosolized pentamidine are even more promising in treating pneumocystis pneumonia, the most common killer of those with AIDS. Increased access to these drugs will enable HIV infected persons to remain healthy—avoiding costly hospital care which is already straining the budgets of federal, state and local governments.

It is the Conference of Mayors' belief that the Low Income AIDS/HIV Treatment Assistance Program would be best retained as a solely federal program. Establishing a state option to "opt out" of the federal-state matching requirement would shift the financial burden of the program to cities—the level of government least able to absorb these added costs or raise moneys in support of the program. Such a move would be an unprecedented shift from the established federal-state partnership in financing health care in America.

As you are well aware, the vast majority of AIDS cases to date occur in our major cities. Our mayors find themselves on the front line of this disease, with local government bearing a significant financial proportion of this national epidemic. The Low Income AIDS/HIV Treatment Assistance Program should remain as it was originally intended: a clear federal commitment to dealing with a national health crisis that is overwhelming the capacity of state and local resources.

The U.S. Conference of Mayors is very supportive of your efforts to authorize the Low Income Treatment Assistance Program. We look forward to working with you to ensure that treatment for HIV infection and AIDS is made available to all who need it. Please do not hesitate to call Richard D. Johnson, Assistant Executive Director, at 293-7330, if you or your staff have any questions or if we can be of any assistance to you.

Sincerely,

J. THOMAS COCHRAN,
Executive Director.

ASSOCIATION OF SCHOOLS OF PUBLIC HEALTH,
July 17, 1989.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: On behalf of the 24 deans of the schools of public health, I wish to reaffirm our support for a provision that would facilitate access to drugs for low income persons with HIV infection. As you know well, such funding expires September 30, and the sooner the issue is addressed, the more effectively states can plan for therapies. We, therefore, support you in your efforts to make such provision as soon as possible in the Congressional legislative season.

Sincerely,

D.A. HENDERSON, MD, MPH,
ASPH President and Dean, School of Hygiene and Public Health, The Johns Hopkins University.

JULY 19, 1989.

Hon. EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR KENNEDY: We, the undersigned denominational and interfaith agencies, thank you for your leadership in the passage of S. 586 which authorized a six month extension of federal subsidies to provide the life saving drug AZT to low income persons living with AIDS.

The effectiveness of this particular treatment has been well documented in scientific literature, but is dependent on regular, continuous prescribed use. Its availability for low income persons, however, has been equally dependent on short term appropriation authorizations. While certainly not a permanent solution, a longer term effort is needed to ensure persons living with AIDS that they at least can depend on the availability of AZT for the course of their treatment.

In addition, with the emergence of other forms of treatment for HIV infection and AIDS, there needs to be a mechanism for states and the federal government to provide a more stable source of support for such treatment to low income persons with AIDS.

It is our understanding that the Low Income AIDS HIV/Treatment Assistance Program could provide this increased assurance. This proposal calls for the authorization of a 36 month, interim AIDS/HIV treatment program to be funded at $30 million in FY 90 with similar amounts in the remaining years. The program would be administered by the Health Resources and Systems Administration with a 50/50 split of cost between the federal government and the states.

It is essential that the appropriate federal agencies take what they have learned from the success of the AZT authorization extension and apply it to other life saving treatments. With the availabiliy of additional treatments to low income persons will come additional benefits, not only to those receiving the treatments, but to society as well. Many of the new treatments, in particular aerosolized pentamidine, have been proven effective as a preventative agent in the treatment of pneumocystis pneumonia. This particular opportunistic infection lead to the death of over 17,000 persons last year. At the current time this life perserving treatment is unavailable to thousands of persons with AIDS because no mechanism such as the AIDS Treatment Program is in effect. This program should be targeted at the most needy. 85% of persons with AIDS currently receiving treatments like AZT have incomes below 200% of the poverty level. These persons should be those most eligible for such a program.

While we are well aware that this type of effort will not provide a permanent solution to the ongoing financial and treatment needs of low income persons with AIDS, it is a dramatic step forward. We support your continuing efforts to bring this type of essential health care to persons with AIDS and know that we will urge your fellow members of Congress to support this measure as well.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF COMMUNITY HEALTH CENTERS, INC.,
Miami, FL, September 17, 1989.

To Whom It May Concern:

At its 20th Annual Convention and Community Health Institute, the National Association of Community Health Centers has passed the following resolutions, developed by the AIDS Task Force and approved today by the NACHC House of Delegates:

1. As a major provider of primary care for a large percentage of our population nationally, community health centers are already confronting and accepting the responsibility for the care of significant numbers of HIV-infected individuals.

It is crystal clear that the epidemic which is now sweeping our country will not be confined to the poor, to the IV drug abuser, the homosexual, or the transfusion recipient.

HIV infection will spread throughout the entire population. There is no family that is immune. This disease now threatens not only our lives but the health care delivery "non-system" on which all of us depend.

The challenge posed by HIV infection presents a crisis which must be faced squarely now if we are going to survive. It is incumbent upon all that we maintain our comprehensive approach to health care which includes all health services: disease prevention and health promotion for our entire population, to include perinatal, pediatric, adult and geriatric care.

In a society which has homelessness, substance abuse, violence, racism and is closer to collapse than we care to realize, it is important that we now use the HIV epidemic to bring us together. If we fulfill our primary care mission as was the original intent, we can improve our health care overall, and end the categorical approaches and the attendant waste and duplication which continue to plague us.

The National Association of Community Health Centers must bring the collective weight of our communities to strengthen the existing coalition, and clearly establish its leadership profile and begin to coordinate a national effort to fight AIDS.

2. The recent announcements with reference to the new uses of AZT are both welcome and frustrating: welcome because they bring hope and the promise of longer life to a previously doomed population; frustrating because the drug AZT is costly and out of the reach of most community health center users.

We call upon our national association to lead the fight to make AZT and all other effective therapeutic measures available, not just to the affluent, but to all members of our society.

To that end we call on our government to use its inherent powers to bring the new medicines to the population whose lives depend on them. AZT is our immediate goal and we need it now.

JOHN HOLLOMAN, M.D.,
Chairman, AIDS Task Force.
ROLAND J. GARDNER,
President.

NATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS RESPONDING TO AIDS,
Washington, DC, July 12, 1989.

DEAR SENATOR: The promising news about early intervention for people with HIV infection, as well as therapeutics for people with AIDS, is tempered by a policy challenge to find a way to finance the care and treatment theoretically available but realistically unaccessible.

Two years ago, the Senate passed a special measure with bi-partisan support to provide financial assistance to people with HIV infection and related diseases in order to purchase drugs. At the time, AZT was the newest and most promising drug, but its price was virtually unaffordable for most Americans. Since that original program, Congress has supported two extensions with a promise to enact a more permanent and equitable program.

We are writing to urge your support for a three year authorization on a bill to provide financial assistance to people with HIV infection for the purpose of purchasing life extending medical therapies and treatments. This program would be designed to assist low income individuals and should include both federal and state matching funds. We believe that such a program is in keeping with our nation's commitment to extend the productive lives of those who are HIV infected, as well as meeting the equity concerns of a public health epidemic.

Currently, funds avaiable from the federal government will expire on September 30, 1989. Without a new authorization and corresponding appropriations, thousands of Americans will be faced with the cruel dilemma of treatment vs. poverty or death. There is much to be proud of in our scientific advances of late, but these advances are truly meaningless without the opportunity for people to access the new treatments and therapies.

We look forward to your support of this worthwhile program.

REGARDING CFC REGULATORY PROVISIONS

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, many of my colleagues have inquired about provisions of the reconciliation bill adopted by the Environment and Public Works Committee with respect to regulation of chlorofluorocarbons or CFC's. I will take a few moments to respond to those inquiries.

The stripped down version of the reconciliation bill we are considering does not include parts A and B of the Environment Committee's legislation. Those are the parts that include a statutory phaseout of the production, distribution and importation of ozone-depleting chemicals and provided for a methane study.

It is my view, and that of many of my colleagues on the committee, that those provisions are not extraneous within the meaning of the Byrd rule which restricts consideration of non-budgetary matters on reconciliation. However, the package before us does not include the CFC phaseout and we do not intend to offer amendments restoring it to this bill.

CFC legislation has been, and remains, a top priority of the Environment and Public Works Committee. Over the course of the past 3 years the Subcommittee on Environmental Protection has held 10 hearings on the subject of ozone depletion and global climate change. While implementation of the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer represents a major step in curbing production and use of ozone-depleting substances, it is my firm belief that additional legislative controls are needed.

The severity of the problem was the subject of a Washington Post article last Friday, October 6. The article describes the scientific assessment of the seasonal hole in the ozone layer over Antarctica for this year. NASA scientists estimate that this year's hole covers 10 million square miles, with ozone depletion occurring at the rate of 1.5 percent per day. It is believed that the ozone destruction that occurs this year will be similar to that recorded in 1987 when nearly 50 percent of the Antarctic ozone layer was destroyed.

While the legislation reported by the committee was criticized by some for not going far enough, and others for being too stringent, I believe that it provides a necessary and fair approach to eliminating the most destructive chemicals from the environment in the shortest timeframe. As the single largest producer and consumer of CFC's and other ozone-depleting chemicals, the United States has an obligation to act as quickly as possible. Therefore, it is my intention to push for action on CFC legislation in the near future.

Finally, I'd like to clear up some basic misconceptions about the legislation and the committee's actions. Opponents of the CFC subtitle have argued that it somehow materialized out of thin air and that the committee short-circuited conventional legislative procedures. Nothing could be further from the truth. As noted previously, the committee has held exhaustive hearings on the subject. My distinguished colleague from Rhode Island, Senator CHAFEE, and I sponsored legislation both last Congress and this year on the issue. The two bills that formed the basis of the reconciliation piece were the subject of a hearing held by the Environmental Protection Subcommittee in May.

The fact that the committee recommended CFC legislation as part of reconciliation is consistent with the budget summit agreement and a proposal included in the President's budget for the coming year. The President explicitly proposed capturing the market value for limited rights to produce CFC's in fiscal year 1990.

I will not consume more of the Senate's time on this matter today. However, I want to stress that the absence of CFC control provisions in the reconciliation bill does not signify the end of the matter. We will bring such legislation before the Senate in the near future.

RECONCILIATION FY 1990 BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate Budget Committee voted against this reconciliation package by a vote of 9 to 6. I voted no.

Since that vote, Mr. President, the reconciliation bill has been transformed from a Christmas tree free-for-all to a responsible deficit-reduction measure.

The purpose of reconciliation is to reduce the deficit. It is not intended as a vehicle for pet legislation, particularly when that legislation has not undergone public hearings; and particularly when the cost of these pet programs will mushroom in the out years.

In my view, this bill now more resembles a clean deficit-reduction measure. It is consistent with the instructions of the budgt resolution passed in May which I supported.

I would also indicate, Mr. President, that I am a strong supporter of the capital gains tax rate cut, and I regret that we did not have an opportunity to support it as part of reconciliation. Nonetheless, I intend to support that provision on the next possible vehicle in the weeks ahead.

Mr. President, I wish to commend the efforts of the Senate leaders—on both sides of the aisle—to rein in the unbridled process that led to this reconciliation hodgepodge. I only regret that this herculean effort did not take place 3 months ago. I urge the passage of this bill. Thank you, Mr. President.

BUDGET RECONCILIATION

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I applaud the patient and persistent efforts of the leadership to produce a budget reconcilation resolution that maintains the integrity of the congressional budget process.

Like many of my colleagues, I realize how painful it is to have programs I care deeply about for the constituents in Massachusetts not included in this resolution. However, I think it is much more important that the reconciliation process not be abused or misused.

Like other of my colleagues, I expect to fight for items important to Massachusetts on other pieces of legislation that will not harm the reconciliation process.

As I stated clearly as one of the early sponsors of Gramm-Rudman, I believe it is incumbent upon the Congress to enact a responsible budget process. And part of a responsible budget process is the maintenance of the integrity of the reconciliation process.

Therefore, I applaud the leadership for their efforts to ensure that the integrity of the process is maintained and for having the courage and wisdom to present the Senate with a product that strengthens our budgeting process.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I support the efforts of the bipartisan leadership to regain control of the budget reconciliation process. In particular, I applaud bringing the tax writing process out of the back room and out from behind the protection of reconciliation. While I lament the demise of some very important and meritorious provisions that were in this bill, I accept the wisdom of the leadership and accept that these provisions must await another day. And I assume that this day will come in this session of this Congress.

I will not attempt here to identify all of the important and meritorious provisions that were in this bill and are needed for the well-being of millions of Americans, including many in my State of New York. Mr. President, tax provisions for group legal services, targeted jobs tax credits, mortgage revenue bonds, low-income housing credits, employee provided educational assistance and small issue IDB's must be enacted this year or these provisions will expire. Obviously, we need a tax bill this year.

Mr. President, the small businesses of America need the repeal of section 89, the monster that the Congress with good intentions created in 1986. They also need the 25-percent deduction for medical insurance of self-employed individuals. Again, we need a tax bill this year.

The lamentable condition of Lake Onondaga near Syracuse, NY, needs the attention of this body to reclaim this wonderful natural resource. Many, many additional important matters must be addressed. I am hopeful that this will be a productive session of Congress which deals with each of these matters in the studious manner which they deserve and which the Senate can be proud of.

I should not overlook many meritorious provisions which remain in this bill. We have taken some important steps toward eliminating some of the bias in the Tax Code in favor of misuse of high-yield debt financing. This is important and it should become law as part of reconciliation.

Finally, I will address an issue that should and hopefully will be resolved during subsequent legislation this year. As my colleagues are aware, the Tax Reform Act of 1986 was designed to remedy the allegation that the prior tax system was unfair and exceedingly complex. After extensive review of the then existing structure, the Congress enacted a broad and comprehensive reform of the tax system. The act provided for the reduction of tax rates through base broadening and a strengthening of the alternative minimum tax [AMT]. While the alternative minimum tax has proved to be an effective means for ensuring that all taxpayers, corporate and individual, pay taxes on their economic income, the provision has significant design shortcomings and has produced a variety of inequitable and unintended consequences. One of the more obvious and egregious examples is the so-called book backstop alternative for calculating AMT depreciation.

Under current law, corporations are subject to an alternative minimum tax which is payable to the extent that it exceeds the corporation's regular tax. The tax is imposed at a flat rate of 20 percent on alternative minimum tax income in excess of a $40,000 exemption amount. The foreign tax credit is allowed against the minimum tax and a minimum tax credit is available in certain instances.

29-059 O-90-41 (Pt. 17)

On January 1, 1990, all corporations will be compelled to undertake a series of complex and unnecessary calculations in figuring their AMT income. As currently drafted, every corporation subject to the AMT will compute its tentative minimum tax income and then compare the result with a second calculation called adjusted current earnings [ACE]. The most difficult and complicated adjustment mandated by ACE is the depreciation adjustment which, in effect, requires taxpayers to compare regular straight line depreciation with financial statement or book depreciation. This latter adjustment is very costly to capital intensive companies and discriminates against assets purchased prior to 1990.

The AMT depreciation anomaly is particularly onerous for leasing companies because under Financial Accounting Standards Board [FASB] rules there is no book depreciation permitted on financial leases and the full amount of tax depreciation could then become the ACE depreciation adjustment. While it is clear that the Congress intended to slow down the tax benefits associated with tangible assets, it was neither intended nor assumed that the full amount of the depreciation would become a preference and therefore fully taxable. Finally, Federal tax policy with regard to the change to ACE was based on the presumption that tax rules should be the basis for tax calculations and not the taxpayers book treatment of an item.

Recognizing these problems the Congress attempted to restructure the AMT as part of the Technical Corrections Act of 1988. Unfortunately these improvements were not included as part of the final legislation and we are once again confronted with the uncertainty and inequity created by the so-called book backstop provision. Only this time we are faced with the fast approaching deadline of January 1, 1990.

Mr. President, I applaud what has been accomplished here today and challenge my colleagues to now deal directly and effectively with this unfinished business.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I will vote for this bipartisan bill.

However, I want to make clear that I support many of the provisions which have been struck. I trust that the Senate will be allowed to vote for them as part of a free standing bill in the near future. I am pleased to hear the chairman of the Finance Committee's commitment to try to do this.

For instance I support the repeal of section 89. I also support the extensions of the targeted jobs tax credit, the low-income housing credit, the mortgage revenue bond program, the employer-provided educational assistance income exclusion, the research and development tax credit, the health insurance deduction for the self-employed, and the renewable energy tax credits among others. I also support the provisions to improve rural health care, to restore income averaging for farmers, to allow retirees to earn more income without losing Social Security benefits, to expand tax credits for child care and to expand the eligibility for individual retirement accounts. I cite these provisions only as examples of the many provisions in the original reconciliation bill which I supported.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back all of my time at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has yielded back his time. The Senator from New Mexico yields his.

The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 10:45 the Senate proceed to vote on H.R. 3299 and that the yeas and nays are requested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the majority leader's request? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order the clerk will read the bill for a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order the clerk will report the House reconciliation bill, H.R. 3299.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 3299) entitled the "Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989."

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Republican leader seek recognition?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I direct my question for information of Members. I understand that shortly after the vote on reconciliation there will be a cloture vote; is that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct. As soon as there is final disposition of this matter, and that will be a very short time, after the vote there will be a cloture vote on the Nicaragua Elections Act, so Senators should remain. There will be a second vote after this vote and then there are several amendments in order and pending to that measure so that we could be here for some time after that with possibility of several rollcall votes thereafter.

If neither of the managers or the distinguished Republican leader has anything further, Mr. President, I remind Senators that the vote will occur at 10:45.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. FORD. Will the Senator withhold?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I withhold and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, all after the enacting clause is stricken, the text of S. 1750, as amended, is substituted in lieu thereof, and the House bill is deemed read a third time.

The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators will please take their seats.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, my distinguished friend from Maine, Mr. COHEN, said a few moments ago that the crash of the stock market today or the fall of 191 points was because we have not passed the capital gains.

I have not heard that all day. My news and the ticker tape and all that was that this afternoon and middle afternoon, the financial people notified those who wanted to purchase United Air Lines that they could not finance it, almost $7 billion, and that is what caused the huge slide in the last hour, hour and a half.

On June 23, Senator MCCAIN and I introduced a piece of legislation that has now cleared the Commerce Committee. It relates to giving authority to the Secretary of Transportation to be in at the beginning of the leveraged buyouts of airlines.

Now we are getting into a lot of trouble. Foreign airlines are buying a piece of that. They are even structuring the purchase of the type of airlines that are purchased by American airlines. You can look at the recent cancellation of the Airbus and the purchase of Boeing. I do not have any problem with that. But it shows the influence of the foreign air carriers on the American leveraged buyouts.

So I would just like to say to my friends that I am hopeful that this piece of legislation will be brought before the Senate in the next few days, either freestanding or as an amendment to another piece of legislation, so that we can get on with giving the Secretary of Transportation the authority. He went before Northwest. The only leverage he had was to cancel their certificate as a carrier, and he jawboned and got some results. So I think it is time we look at the leveraged buyout situation as it relates to airlines.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make technical and clerical corrections in the bill and that this unanimous-consent request supersede the prior request with respect to technical and clerical corrections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

By virtue of the order previously entered, the question now occurs on the passage of H.R. 3299, as amended.

The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WIRTH] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI] would vote "yea."

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP], and the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] would each vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONRAD). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 87, nays 7, as follows:

NOT VOTING—6

Boren	Hatfield	Wilson
DeConcini	Wallop	Wirth

So the bill (H.R. 3299), as amended, was passed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill, as amended, was passed.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 1750 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DODD. Reserving the right to object, is there any time for debate?

Mr. MITCHELL. If I may, this unanimous-consent request has to do with the indefinite postponement of the Senate reconciliation bill. We have just passed the House bill. I renew my request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If we can have order in the Chamber so the unanimous-consent request can be heard, the Senate will proceed with its business.

The majority leader has renewed his unanimous-consent request. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is my understanding under the previous order there is no time limitation on debate. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico.

MOTION TO INSTRUCT

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send a motion to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico, Mr. DOMENICI, moves that in relation to H.R. 3299, the conferees be instructed to insist on the Senate amendment and to accept no House language which does not result in savings or in revenue increases, as envisioned by the Budget Act description of reconciliation.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have asked the distinguished majority leader, the chairman of the Budget Committee, and the minority leader, Senator DOLE, and they indicate they concur in that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. SIMON. Parliamentary inquiry. Is this motion debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This motion is fully debatable.

Mr. SIMON. I will oppose the motion. Let me just point out I voted "no" on the reconciliation. Among other things, there is a fee schedule for five airports in this country, one of which is O'Hare, which will pay half the fees. I, frankly, did not make any amendment, did not make a big issue about this on the floor. I think it is something the conference ought to be able to consider and if this motion is agreed to, we cannot consider it. I think there very well may be other mistakes in this thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMON. I will be pleased to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. The motion to instruct has no binding effect on the conferees. It is an expression of the Senate and the Senate urging that the Senate conferees adhere to the Senate position.

Mr. SIMON. If the majority leader says this is simply a sentimental gesture, then——

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think I used those words.

Mr. SIMON. May I inquire of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. DOMENICI. I might say a motion to strike is clearly in order in conference. I am not suggesting that would not be in order. It seems to me that with an 87-to-7 vote that we ought to buttress our conferees with a statement saying we do not want a bill like the one we just got rid of.

Mr. SIMON. The process I wholeheartedly support, and I thank the Senator from New Mexico, and I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I make a parliamentary inquiry. I understand under the unanimous-consent agreement that we would move immediately to the vote on the cloture motion on the Nicaraguan elections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 30 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I say to my colleagues before we agree to this motion, it is 11:10 at night on Friday evening. We are about to enter a debate that has matters in it that go beyond just a $9 million appropriation. This is not the time, regardless of where it comes out on this issue, to be debating something of this significance, in my view. I regret we are here at this hour, but this is a matter that could have been decided a month ago with proper consideration.

I just urge, despite the efforts of the majority leader and others, that we reject this motion and defeat the motion on cloture and debate this on Tuesday, when we come back, or Monday. I will be glad to come back on Monday and debate all day and vote on Tuesday. To debate at 11:10 on a Friday night something of this import is a mistake. The Members are tired and they want to get back to their States. It is a mistake.

We ought not invoke cloture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, free and fair elections in Nicaragua are an important goal, one that is in the national security interests of the United States, and the interests of the people of Nicaragua and the entire hemisphere. Because of the importance of the question of how best to assure this, it is my belief that this late hour—nearly midnight—is not the appropriate time to begin and complete this debate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate for 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into yesterday. The Senator from Connecticut was present on the floor when it was entered into, and I said at that time that we would move to cloture after acting on the reconciliation bill. I predicted that it would occur late tomorrow night, meaning tonight. Rarely have my predictions been so accurate. No one objected at that time. We had 2 hours of debate yesterday on the subject. Everyone had a chance to express their views. It was understood and accepted by everyone that the cloture vote would occur late tonight. This is not the first, and I regret to advise Senators it will not be the last time we debate an issue at 11 o'clock at night. Therefore, having entered into an agreement with the full, open——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for 30 more seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. With the full, open and informed consent of every Senator including the principal participants in this issue, I see no basis now for not proceeding. We agreed to proceed. We anticipated we would proceed at this time. We said we would proceed at this time, and I suggest we proceed at this time.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, as manager of the bill, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to proceed for 45 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, as manager of the bill, I am prepared to go forward, just so all Senators understand, however they vote. If we get cloture, we will complete it, I understand from the majority leader, tonight but that means a number of votes and my estimate would be at least 5 hours, possibly 7 hours, but it will be real debate because the matters will come close together if we have cloture tonight. All Senators should be aware of that. I am perfectly prepared to go forward, but that is really what the schedule will be.

Mr. STEVENS. Regular order.

ASSISTANCE FOR FREE AND FAIR ELECTIONS IN NICARAGUA

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, following the disposition of the reconciliation bill, the clerk will report the motion to invoke cloture.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on H.R. 3385, an act to provide assistance for free and fair elections in Nicaragua. Signed by 18 Senators as follows:

CALL OF THE ROLL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the quorum call has been waived.

VOTE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on H.R. 3385, an act to provide assistance for free and fair elections in Nicaragua, be brought to a close. The yeas and nays are required. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WIRTH] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI] would vote "yea."

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP], and the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] would vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 52, nays 42, as follows:

NOT VOTING—6

Boren	Hatfield	Wilson
DeConcini	Wallop	Wirth

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 52, the nays are 42. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn not having voted in the affirmative, the motion is rejected.

May we have order in the Chamber so the business of the Senate can proceed?

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, cloture not having been obtained on this vote, it would be my intention—I note the presence of the distinguished Senator from Iowa on the floor who has been the principal opponent to this measure—to file another cloture petition if we can get agreement; that we would then have a vote on that cloture petition immediately following the caucus on Tuesday as we had contemplated doing earlier this evening but were not able to get agreement on then it is my feeling that if we did not get cloture then, there would be no further effort; if cloture were obtained, that we would then proceed to consider the amendments that have been agreed to, under the prior order, were in order, had cloture been obtained on this measure.

I inquire of the Senator from Iowa or the distinguished Republican leader, if they wish to comment on that suggestion.

Mr. SABARNES. Will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly.

Mr. SARBANES. I take it there is a unanimous-consent request that now limits the number of amendments to the measure; is that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. I am told that is not correct.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is no longer in effect. It qualified certain specified amendments to be in order if cloture had been invoked, even though the amendments might not otherwise have been germane, had cloture been invoked.

Mr. HARKIN. If I can ask the distinguished majority leader to yield, I want to make it clear—as I know the majority leader knows—to all Senators here this evening, earlier this evening I was asked by the distinguished majority leader if I would be amenable to putting off the cloture vote until 2 o'clock on Tuesday. I said, yes, I would. It was not my intent to have a cloture vote tonight. I agreed to put it off until 2 o'clock Tuesday. It was not this Senator's objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator is absolutely correct. It was my suggestion as well that we put it off until after the conference on Tuesday, but that consent could not be obtained from all Senators. There was objection to it. Therefore, we had to proceed this evening under the agreement. It was my desire to postpone it until then as well, and the Senator is quite correct, he agreed to it.

Mr. HARKIN. Under the agreement entered into before, that unanimous-consent agreement now has been vitiated by the fact that cloture was not invoked; is that my understanding?

Mr. MITCHELL. I inquire of the Chair as to the accuracy of that assertion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will consult the Parliamentarian.

Can the Senator from Iowa repeat his question?

Mr. HARKIN. The unanimous-consent agreement that was entered into pertaining to the cloture vote that was just taken specified certain amendments and individuals who could offer those amendments. Since cloture was not invoked, is that agreement limiting the number of amendments and those individuals who could offer those amendments still in force, or has that agreement that limits the number of amendments and those who can offer those amendments been done away with by the fact that cloture was not invoked?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question as stated by the Senator from Iowa would require the answer that the agreement is not vitiated by the failure to invoke cloture.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARKIN. Yes.

Mr. LEAHY. Without losing his right to the floor.

Mr. HARKIN. I do not know if I have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. I ask the distinguished majority leader—Mr. President, possibly there is a way to get around the question of what was the agreement or not. I think there are a number of people in this body who voted against cloture tonight, who are perfectly willing to see this matter come to a vote and either to vote for or against it, willing to have a straight up-or-down vote.

Might I ask the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished Republican leader if it might be possible to craft a unanimous-consent agreement here that would say we would start the whole process exactly as we had it here at 2 o'clock, or whatever time we finished our caucuses on Tuesday, and then plan to go straight through until completion?

In other words, we would have a cloture vote at 2 o'clock on Tuesday. If that did not succeed, then that is probably the end of it. But if that succeeded, we could go down to a similar agreement as we had before, until we complete it. I understand that would require setting aside whatever else was pending at that time. But I say to the distinguished leaders on both sides of the aisle that I am perfectly prepared, as a manager of this bill, to go forward at that time. I would assume my distinguished colleague and friend from Wisconsin would be, too. I cannot speak for him on the unanimous-consent agreement, but if we went through the same procedure, we would probably complete it by supper time or so on Tuesday.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I make a suggestion which perhaps could enable us all to go home and come back to this another day. I will ask the Senator through the Chair, the Senator from Iowa, if he would be agreeable, if we file another cloture petition this evening, to schedule the vote on that cloture petition at 2:15 p.m. on Tuesday, on the condition that we enter into an agreement which would, as the previous agreement did, qualify for consideration post cloture in the event cloture is then invoked, to certain specified amendments, including an amendment which was listed to be offered by Senator DODD, relative to no funds to the Nicaraguan Government, that would now be listed as an amendment to be offered by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARKIN. If the distinguished majority leader will yield, I still have a question about the process. The amendments that were listed and the agreement entered into pertain to nongermane amendments that would be allowed under post cloture. I inquire of the Chair, is it correct that this agreement in no way limits others who may want to offer germane amendments, post cloture, if cloture is invoked?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Timely filed germane amendments are not limited.

Mr. HARKIN. Under the unanimous consent proposal agreement proposed by the distinguished majority leader, when would germane amendments have to be timely filed in order to be considered after post cloture, if the cloture vote is to be taken at 2:15 p.m. on Tuesday next?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Second-degree amendments would have to be filed by 1:15 p.m. Tuesday next.

First-degree amendments would have to be filed by 1 p.m. the next day of session after the motion is filed.

Mr. HARKIN. I assume that Monday would be a day.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct, but since it is unlikely we would be in by 1 p.m. Monday, I would propose that we include in the consent request the permission to file first-degree amendments prior to 6 p.m. on Monday.

That would give the Senator and anyone else who wishes to file an amendment ample time to do so. I have not had time to discuss this with the distinguished Republican leader, but I assume that will be acceptable to him.

Mr. HARKIN. We will be in session Monday.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will be in session Monday, but not prior to 2 p.m. I do not want to preclude the Senator.

Mr. HARKIN. My last question to the distinguished majority leader is on the agreement just propounded as to the amendment that was just mentioned, that this Senator would be allowed to offer that either as a first- or second-degree amendment. Is that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am sorry. I did not understand the question.

Mr. HARKIN. On the amendment that is initially going to be offered by Senator DODD——

Mr. MITCHELL. I propose to include that in the Senator's request.

Mr. HARKIN. Would the Senator be allowed to offer it as either a first- or second-degree amendment?

Mr. MITCHELL. This does not limit it.

Mr. HARKIN. It does not limit it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senators to the left will refrain their conversations so the business of the Senate can go on.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, will the Senator be agreeable on those terms?

Mr. HARKIN. This Senator will be agreeable.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why do I not propound the request?

Mr. President, accordingly I will propound the unanimous-consent request. If any Senator has objection, he or she may object.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at 2:15 p.m. on Tuesday next, a quorum call under rule XXII being waived, the Senate proceed to vote on the motion to invoke cloture on H.R. 3385, an act to provide assistance for free and fair elections in Nicaragua; that the following amendments be in order regardless of the outcome of the cloture vote:

An amendment by Senators ADAMS and HARKIN relative to the transfer of this funding to a drug program; an amendment by Senator DODD relative to funding to the National Endowment for Democracy and observer groups; an amendment by Senator HARKIN relative to no funds to the Nicaraguan Government; an amendment by Senator HARKIN to reducing funding and shifting funding to observer groups; and amendment by Senator HARKIN relative to no funds from the National Endowment for Democracy, only in-kind assistance.

I further ask unanimous consent that the time for filing first-degree amendments be extended from 1 o'clock p.m. on Monday, which would ordinarily apply until 6 p.m. on Monday, and I further ask unanimous consent that the amendments listed above, in addition to being in order regardless of the outcome of the cloture vote, could be offered either as first- or second-degree amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, add one amendment by Senator DOLE relative to funding of Nicaraguan opposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, accordingly there will be no further rollcall votes this evening.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before everyone leaves?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. We are not going to do any more on this tonight, but I am advised that the Presidents of Guatemala, El Salvador, and Honduras will be writing Ortega to see if they want to extend the registration period. The deadline is October 22.

We are not going to have any registration this Sunday. It will be one additional Sunday. I have prepared a letter and I think everyone will find it to be precisely as it is, it is a letter to Commandante Daniel Ortega, signed by Senators, where we indicate we believe in truly free and fair elections. For this reason we are concerned over the absence of a mechanism for registration of voters living as exiles or refugees in El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica. There are more than 100,000 Nicaraguans who wish to participate in the election, and so forth.

The point is we would like to extend the date for 60 days beyond the October 22 deadline. So I hope that maybe some Members will take a look at this and sign it on the way out. We think a pretty good showing, half or more of the Senators, may have some impact on Daniel Ortega.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is my intention, therefore, that the Senate will return to session at not earlier than 2 p.m. on Monday, and we will state the precise time in the closing order; that there will be debate on the constitutional amendment on the flag, but no votes on Monday; and then we will resume action on that measure Tuesday morning, going to this measure Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield.

Mr. LEAHY. Is it the distinguished majority leader's intention, if cloture is voted on Tuesday then, to stay on this matter until it is completed?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, it is.

Mr. LEAHY. I appreciate that. I will tell the distinguished majority leader, even though I oppose the underlying legislation, I absolutely concur with that and I think we should just stay completely through it and finish it by early evening on Tuesday.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on H.R. 3385, an act to provide assistance for free and fair elections in Nicaragua.

George J. Mitchell, Bob Kerrey, Harry Reid, Bob Dole, John H. Chafee, Bob Kasten, Terry Sanford, T. Daschle, Dennis DeConcini, Frank R. Lautenberg, Connie Mack, Richard G. Lugar, John Heinz, Mitch McConnell, William Cohen, Al Simpson, Bill Armstrong, Lloyd Bentsen.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, if cloture is invoked on H.R. 3385, the Senate remain on the bill until its disposition notwithstanding any previous unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE 99TH ANNIVERSARY OF DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER'S BIRTH

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, tomorrow is a special day for my State of Kansas, for the United States, and, indeed, for the free world as we know it today. Tomorrow marks a very special anniversary—a birthday—for a man from Abilene, KS, named Eisenhower.

Eisenhower. It's a name that stands tall among the giants of American history. It is synonomous with courage, vision, and leadership. Few Americans have had such an impact on their nation, let alone the world.

Tomorrow, October 14, is the 99th anniversary of Dwight D. Eisenhower's birth. Although it has been almost three decades since he left office, his standing among our Presidents continues to rise.

In fact, a recent poll of historians puts him in the top 10, behind only Wilson and FDR in this century. Not bad for a small-town boy from Kansas.

Ike has always been a hero to me, but I'm not alone on that score. Generations of Kansans agree, along with millions of others worldwide. He was my commander-in-chief when I enlisted in the Army in December 1942; he was my party's leader when I first ran for office in 1952; and he remains a role model for all those who want to dedicate their lives to public service.

But when you get right down to it, Eisenhower's mark was that of a true leader, of men in war, of the people of his country, and of all nations that strive for peace. His public career produced some remarkable achievements. Let me cite just a few that were mentioned recently when distinguished Americans were asked what they thought Eisenhower's greatest success was:

Leading the allies to victory in World War II;

Forging the creation of NATO;

Ending the Korean War;

Giving America 8 years of peace and prosperity when he was in the White House;

Exercising real fiscal discipline, as evidenced by his three balanced budgets—that's right, three;

Inspiring the Nation with his integrity, decency, and good will; and Managing peace in the nuclear age.

There are many other accomplishments that could be cited; creating the Interstate Highway System; establishing NASA; supporting free and fair trade; and demonstrating a commitment to equality with his dramatic action to enforce integration in Little Rock. The list could, literally, go on and on.

Nevertheless, reviewing these achievements is not simply an exercise in nostalgia.

That is why I am honored to serve as Chairman of the National Bipartisan Dwight D. Eisenhower Centennial Commission. Paying tribute to Ike during the coming centennial years affords us a special opportunity to revisit some of the seminal events of our time, and to learn from them. Perhaps the most important part of Ike's legacy to our generation was his unshakable faith in freedom.

He would have relished the vision of this generation of Communist leaders being forced to admit the bankruptcy of their ideology and their policies. He would have been excited by the rapid evolution toward democracy in Poland and Hungary, where people long starved for freedom are now moving rapidly and purposefully to regain control of their own nation.

More than 40 years ago, at the height of the cold war, Ike agreed to meet with a Soviet leader being hailed then for bringing new thinking and openness to his rule over the Soviet empire. In his historic meeting with Nikita Khrushchev, President Eisenhower started the process of summitry not because he believed that the fundamental competition between freedom and communism could be negotiated away; but because of his conviction that—despite the differences in our systems—we shared a common interest in waging that competition in ways that would not lead to nuclear war.

President Reagan and President Bush have learned well the lesson that Eisenhower was teaching. We can deal with our adversaries, through dialog and, above all, through strength.

Ike was not without his faults, of course. But when you add it all up, few leaders are his peer.

After all these years, I still like Ike. So does Kansas. And so does America.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for morning business with Senators permitted to speak therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, as we continue to work on the issues of the day, I ask that we not forget that today is the 1,672 day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

REMARKS BY ARNOLD I. BURNS, FORMER DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES, AT THE BOYS CLUBS OF AMERICA'S ANNUAL YOUTH OF THE YEAR CONGRESSIONAL BREAKFAST

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I recently had the pleasure of serving as co-host for the Boys Clubs of America's annual youth of the year congressional breakfast with Representative STENY HOYER of Maryland. At this breakfast, 5 young men representing the 1,300,000 boys and girls currently served by Boys Clubs of America were honored as "Youth of the Year" finalists.

That morning we had the opportunity to hear a remarkable and inspiring speech by Mr. Arnold I. Burns, former Deputy Attorney General of the United States and a vice president of the board of directors for Boys Clubs of America. With great insight and perspicacity, Mr. Burns addressed the compelling and deadly serious topic of our ravaged inner cities and the despair in which so many young Americans live.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. Burn's speech be included in the RECORD, and I would respectfully urge my colleagues to turn an attentive eye and ear to his important message as we consider these weighty issues.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY ARNOLD I. BURNS

Good morning, we are gathered here this morning to celebrate and honor five "Youth of the Year" finalists. These outstanding young leaders have performed a wide array of valuable services in their Clubs and communities.

Anthony, James, John, Felix and Brent—I salute you for giving generously of your time, talents and energy to help family, friends and neighbors. I applaud you for your exceptional dedication to high moral principles. You have distinguished yourselves among your peers by exhibiting a strong and healthy attitude toward life and work, and your good deeds have made a vital contribution to the improvement of our society.

How I wish that all young people had such strong and healthy attitudes? And how I wish that good physical and mental health were characteristic of all American society. Unfortunately, this is not the case.

No, I cannot, in good conscience, give a clean bill of health to America. Disease runs rampant in our inner cities. It is a disease of the spirit that cripples and kills.

Our inner cities are plagued by crime, drugs and violence. There is an epidemic of illiteracy, illegitimacy, filth and poverty. And poverty spawns hunger, homelessness, frustration, anger and despair.

Kids growing up in our cities don't know how to break the cycle of poverty, failure and more poverty. They don't know where to turn for help. They need emergency treatment. But who will cure their ills?

Today, I would like to examine the health of America's young people and check their vital signs. As the examination proceeds, I will discuss the symptomology, diagnosis, treatment and prognosis of our inner city boys and girls. So, if you will bear with me while I put on my doctor's uniform, we'll begin this important examination.

(Put on jacket, penlight, tongue depressor, mirror and stethoscope.)

Good morning. I'm Dr. Burns, Chief Internist and Director of Emergency Medicine at D.C. General Hospital.

At 2:03 a.m., a 16-year-old boy was admitted to the hospital by a police officer. The officer found the patient wounded on the street after being caught in cross-fire during a drug deal gone sour.

The patient spoke mostly in Spanish, and Dr. Carmen Rodriguez, a resident here at the hospital, helped me take a brief history.

In taking the history, I learned that the patient has no father and that his immediate family consists of four brothers and sisters who are being raised by his mother. The patient ran away from home when he was 14. He has spent most of the last two years on the streets and is a member of a street gang.

I first examined the puncture wound to the right thigh that the patient received during the gun fight. Bone fragments and tearing of tendons were evident, along with resultant weakness beyond the injury to the lower extremity.

As the examination proceeded, I observed needle marks in both anti-cubital fossa and inflamation and excoriation in the nasal passages indicating heroine and cocaine use. There was also questionable jaundice in the eyes and a fine tremor in the hands.

The patient had old scarring on his back and was missing several teeth. Hospital records obtained when the patient was admitted to the emergency room four years ago indicated that he had been physically abused during childhood. The case had been referred to a social worker at the time, but was never pursued.

The patient weighs 103 pounds and is short of stature—only 5 feet, 2 inches tall. He is thin, and loose musculature of the abdomen raises the possibility of malnutrition.

Hematologic studies indicate an increased MCV (mean corpuscular volume) raising the possibility of ethanol abuse. Chemistries indicate elevated liver enzymes which support this indication and which also strongly suggest hepatitis. I ordered further hematologic studies to rule out the possibility of AIDS.

The patient was then examined by Dr. Greenberg, head of the psychiatric unit, who filed a report indicating severe depression with suicidal tendencies, extremely anxiety, fear and feelings of inferiority. In Dr. Greenberg's opinion, the patient tried to stifle these feelings by using illegal drugs and alcohol. Use of illegal drugs, in turn, explains why the patient was shot in cross-fire during a drug deal and, consequently, why the patient has an injury to the right thigh.

What, then, is the clinical diagnosis of the various symptoms exhibited by the patient? In summary, the diagnosis I believe to be most inclusive and accurate is acute and abject neglect by family and society.

I would like to point out that this diagnosis is not unusual among inner city teenagers. This case is not at all atypical. Today almost two-thirds of all high school seniors have tried illegal drugs. By the 12th grade, 80 percent of all boys and girls are periodic drinkers. Each year, more than 1 million teenagers become pregnant. Remember, more than 14 million youngsters live in poverty.

Acute neglect is a condition that hampers and cripples millions of girls and boys each year. What is my prescription for the ailments afflicting our youngsters? The most successful way to treat them, in my opinion, is membership in a Boys & Girls Club. Clubs provide a secure environment for young people at-risk of drug and alcohol abuse, premature sexual involvement and juvenile crime. By providing a safe place for young people to go, Clubs help disadvantaged boys and girls "beat the streets." Clubs give young people a chance to develop self-esteem and the social skills they need to become a productive members of society.

Most Clubs are located in neighborhoods with drugs, crime and poverty are everyday facts of life. Who belongs to Boys & Girls Clubs? Sixty-six percent of our members come from families earning $15,000 per year or less; 77 percent are from families with three or more children; 51 percent are from minority families; 47 percent are from single-parent families, and 29 percent are from families receiving public assistance. The Club frequently is the only place in the neighborhood where kids can play and learn under the supervision of a trained, professional adult.

Clubs help their members stay out of trouble with the law, and Club staff become "second parents" to many boys and girls who often turn to them for advice and guidance. Boys & Girls Clubs serve over 1 million boys and 300,000 girls in over 1,100 Club units operated by nearly 600 locally-governed organizations. A total of 56,434 Board and program volunteers help to make the Boys & Girls Club Movement work, and 15,525 full- and part-time staff members enable Clubs to provide youth development services on a daily basis. The care, concern and understanding that young people receive from the Club staff foster trust and the development of sound values.

Research supports this mode of treatment. A 1986 survey conducted by Louis Harris and Associates for Boys Clubs of America revealed that nearly 70 percent of all alumni believe they were kept away from drugs and alcohol due to involvement in their Clubs. Three out of four alumni believe their experience at the Club helped them to avoid difficulty with the law. And nine out of 10 alumni feel that being in a Club had a positive effect on their lives, gave them skills for leadership, helped them get along with others, and influenced their success in later life.

Former Club members who felt they had started life with the most obstacles to overcome—blacks, Hispanics, the economically disadvantage and those from tough neighborhoods—gave their Club the most credit for their success as adults.

Yes, the care, concern and understanding that young people find at the Boys & Girls Club cure many ills of our inner cities. These positive qualities lead boys and girls to the threshold of health and strength of character.

What, then, is the prognosis for millions of children suffering from abandonment and neglect? This, my friends, will depend largely upon what we as a nation and as a society choose to do about the situation. The prognosis can be very good if we make the concerns of our young people a national priority. Boys & Girls Clubs already look after 1,300,000 youngsters. By 1991, at the conclusion of our Outreach '91 program, we will be caring for an additional 700,000 boys and girls, bringing the total number of youth served to 2 million.

A good prognosis also requires that we practice preventive and holistic medicine. It is truly said that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Our top priority is to expand drug prevention education. Some people foolishly think that the drug problem is a Colombian problem or a Burmese problem or a Laotian problem. It is not. It is an American problem. So long as our citizens are willing to buy and use drugs, we will have drugs reaching our markets. We must—we must—dry up the market. We have got to change our peoples' attitudes about drugs—the way we have about alcohol. We've got to take casual users out of the marketplace by arresting and publicly ostracizing them. And we must instill in our children a full understanding of drugs and offer them a viable, exciting, fulfilling substitute for idleness, drugs and then crime.

Making our young people healthy again is going to take a massive, collaborative effort on the part of many youth service organizations, private enterprise, and government at the city, state and federal levels. Some federal agencies have stepped up to the plate and joined with us in our war on drugs: Terry Donahue of the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, Dr. Elaine Johnson of the Office of Substance Abuse Prevention, and Jane Kenney of the Action Agency.

These individuals and agencies have joined and financially supported our efforts in public housing. They have helped provide alternatives, as we convince kids to say "No" to drugs.

The FBI's demand reduction unit has joined forces with Boys Clubs of America to develop after-school initiatives focusing on high-risk youth. We all know this war cannot be won until the demand for drugs decreases. The FBI working with local Boys & Girls Clubs will make a difference.

We need a determined effort to stem the epidemic of despair that plagues America's young people. Happily, Americans know how to come to the aid of each other, and we know how to fight disease when it attacks the health and well-being of our children. If we band together, we can win the war on drugs, we can win the war on poverty, and we can win the war on crime!

Ladies and gentlemen, let me close by reminding you that there is more to medicine than just needles, pills and incisions. Love needs to be a fundamental part of the healing process.

How great it would be if every disadvantaged boy and girl could receive enough love and affection to restore his or her health and vitality. Remember, our children need us. When just one child suffers, the pain is felt by many people. But when millions of children are hurting, our whole nation is at-risk.

Let us not be afraid to show our love and concern, and let us resolve here and now to give more of our time, our talents and our treasure to help our children recuperate and get back on the road to good health. Believe me, your kindness will be repaid many times over. In this way, you, too, can experience some of the same satisfaction that doctors and nurses feel. For when people help others who are injured and who are in need, they also help themselves and all humanity.

Thank you.

CONGRATULATIONS TO COLORADO'S NOBEL PRIZE WINNERS

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, I rise today to salute and honor University of Colorado professor, Thomas Cech and University of Colorado medical school graduate, Sidney Altman, recipients of the 1989 Nobel Prize in chemistry.

Their extraordinary studies determining that ribonucleic acid, or RNA, can actively aid chemical reactions, rather than simply serve as a genetic messenger, have become a turning point in studies in chemistry. Their discovery about RNA shattered the long-held belief that biological reactions are always catalyzed by proteins. Since the Cech-Altman discovery, some scientists have speculated that, because RNA can act as a catalyst, it may have been the original life form.

The findings of these devoted researchers have far-reaching implications. Beyond requiring most chemistry text books to be rewritten, the new information about RNA will help other researchers to combat a myriad of viral diseases—from the common cold to AIDS. While clearly I am not a scientist who will use Dr. Cech's and Dr. Altman's discovery as a launching pad to unravel more biological questions, as a Coloradan, I am exceptionally proud of their work and dedication.

The awarding of the Nobel Prize in chemistry by the Royal Swedish Academy of Sciences to these men reaffirms what I already knew—that Colorado is home to critical scientific research in a variety of fields. Colorado is leading the world in the effort to better understand the world in which we live. Work being completed at the University of Colorado—CU to Coloradans—the National Center for Atmospheric Research, the Solar Energy Research Institute, the forest and range experiment stations, and the NOAA aeronomy lab is providing valuable insights to our natural world.

I am confident that all other Coloradans join me in saluting the accomplishments of Dr. Cech and Dr. Altman and applauding the fact that their work has received this notable, international honor.

CONGRATULATIONS TO GINA TURITTO

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, it takes a special kind of person to help children with special needs. Gina Maria Turitto is one of those outstanding individuals willing to devote her talent, time, and energy to helping her students reach their full potential.

I am delighted that Gina has been named the North Dakota Teacher of the Year by the Association for Retarded Citizens for her work with mentally handicapped students at Saxvik Elementary School in Bismarck. I would like to take this opportunity to commend Gina and all special education teachers for their efforts to educate students with special needs and make their lives a little brighter.

Gina's mother, Darlene Turitto, works in my Bismarck office. The whole family is very proud of Gina and of this well-deserved honor. I ask unanimous consent that the announcement of this year's North Dakota Teacher of the Year award be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the announcement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From a Bismarck Public Schools news release, Oct. 11, 1989]

NORTH DAKOTA TEACHER OF THE YEAR

Gina Turitto is one of those lucky people who has always known what she wanted to do as a career. Now she will be honored in her chosen field. Turitto, a special education teacher at Saxvik Elementary in Bismarck, has been named the outstanding North Dakota Teacher of the Year by the State Association for Retarded Citizens.

Turitto says she is thrilled and honored to be recognized by such a respected group as the A.R.C. She feels she won the award because of her 'personal touch' with educable mentally handicapped students. "Over the years," Turitto says, "parents have told me that the most important thing I do for their children is treat them like individuals, determine their specific needs and design teaching techniques to fit."

One recent example is the reading program Turitto is working on with an eight-year-old multiply handicappped girl. The student cannot point or read aloud, but she can choose words by using the 'eye-gaze' method of looking at them. "I thoroughly enjoy helping students reach their fullest potential," says Turitto. "I believe students can achieve anything if they have teachers who are innovative, creative and have a positive attitude.

Turitto has taught special education in Bismarck for ten years. She is a firm believer in the integrated approach to teaching the handicapped. All of her students at Saxvik are currently mainstreamed into 'regular' education classrooms for a part of their day. Turitto says, "It's more work because I have to help the classroom teacher with modified lesson plans and discipline problems, but I've seen the benefits, and it's worth it!" Saxvik is one of several public schools in Bismarck that is involved in a pilot integration program through the Department of Public Instruction.

Jack Bye, the executive director of the Association for Retarded Citizens, says mandatory education for all handicapped people has always been a main focus of the group. He says the A.R.C. recognizes teachers like Gina because of it's belief that education is the key to unlocking the potential of handicapped citizens.

Turitto's name and others were submitted to the state association by local A.R.C. units. Candidates for the award were judged on the basis of three criteria: a positive influence, attitude and thinking regarding the education of persons with mental retardation; a willingness to assist in the Association's goal of providing full educational opportunities for all mentally retarded citizens; and a significant involvement with parents and others in the educational process.

Turitto will be presented with the North Dakota Teacher of the Year award at the state A.R.C. convention Friday, November 10 at 6:30 p.m. at the Ramada Inn in Grand Forks.

RURAL AMERICA'S WAR ON DRUGS

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, last week the Senate unanimously passed the 1989 National Drug Control Strategy bill. I am pleased that the rural drug problem was addressed in the drug bill. I am hopeful that certain provisions directed at rural States such as South Dakota will remain part of the package when the bill comes out of conference committee.

In particular, the Biden amendment to the Drug Control Strategy Act calls for each State to have a minimum of 10 Drug Enforcement Administration [DEA] special agents. My home State of South Dakota has a total of four DEA agents. According to the South Dakota attorney general, the most needed resource is personnel to work on drug-related crime. Additional personnel are needed in the areas of training, intelligence collection, analysis and dissemination of drug-related information, and the establishment of multijurisdictional drug task forces.

The Biden amendment would provide more of the Federal resources South Dakota needs to effectively combat the rural drug problem. The Biden amendment is a step in the right direction toward solving the rural drug problem in South Dakota. Therefore, I urge the Senate and House conferees to protect this provision.

ETHANOL BASED FUEL ADDITIVE-ETBE FUEL OF THE FUTURE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, America is at a crossroads. As we approach the 21st century, we must look to our own energy resources in order to remain strong. This year we have an opportunity to send a strong signal that the United States is committed to further development of alternative fuels that will strengthen this Nation by reducing foreign oil imports.

As all my colleagues know, oil imports are on the rise. Nearly 50 percent of the total deliveries in the United States are imports. It doesn't take an expert to understand that we are reaching the dangerous levels of 1973 and 1979 when OPEC was first able to affect gas supplies through painful oil embargoes. We must look to America first in the development of a secure, domestic energy supply.

Mr. President, I have been a supporter of alternative fuels for many years. In particular oxygenated fuels, such as ethanol blends, show great promise in reducing our dangerous reliance on foreign oil imports. Ethanol development will enable the United States to never again be dependent on OPEC.

At the same time, we have a unique opportunity to address and contribute in a positive way to environmental protection and economic development of our depressed rural, agricultural areas.

American farmers will see new markets for agricultural products, including increased demand for millions of bushels of corn used in ethanol production. In addition, rural communities, dependent on the health and well-being of American agriculture, will see economic benefits as well.

American consumers will have available a high-performance fuel additive that will reduce air pollution, improve our balance of trade, and reduce Fedral Farm Program costs.

Cities in nonattainment with Federal air pollution standards will see lower ozone levels and dramatically reduced hydrocarbon aromatics levels with ethanol blends.

Mr. President, I recently received an interesting article from Secretary of Agriculture Clayton Yeutter. It is a clear and concise description of a new ethanol-based fuel additive, ETBE. ETBE is an improvement on gasahol in several areas. First, it is easier to transport to gas stations because it extracts less water in the pipeline unlike straight gasoline.

Second, ETBE is lower in oxygen content than gasoline and has the potential to significantly boost octane ratings for fuel and as a result provide higher performance levels for automobiles. Also, because it is less volatile, ETBE offers the U.S. refining industry a way to sell butane. ETBE burns butane more efficiently and can meet EPA's strict air quality standards.

On October 4 the Senate Finance Committee approved an amendment which would clarify the blenders tax credit and provide that ethanol use in the manufacturer of ETBE would qualify for the Federal alcohol fuels credit. I believe it was the intent of Congress when the alcohol fuels credit was established in 1980 that the credit apply to new and perhaps unforseen ethanol fuel uses. This clarification is necessary for the commercialization of ETBE.

Mr. President, it is not often that one product can provide so many benefits. It is absolutely irresponsible to wait until a crisis is at hand. The benefits of an alternative fuels policy for America are clear: A stable and secure domestically produced energy supply; jobs and economic development for thousands of rural Americans; and cleaner air for our urban areas suffering from the threat of federally imposed sanctions for failure to meet ambient air standards.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW ETHANOL-BASED FUEL ADDITIVE SHOWS PROMISE

(By Jake Jacobsen)

A massive new demand for corn could be on the horizon. An estimate of that demand has been put at 3.3 billion bushels annually. This potential demand springs from the development of a new ethanol-based fuel additive.

The people who are working to develop the potential for that new demand are chemists, microbiologists, oil refiners, automobile engineers, bankers, lawyers, salesmen, and farmers.

The company in the Plains developing this new product which uses corn to make alcohol describes its efforts in Nebraska and Kansas as "building a bridge between agriculture and petroleum refining."

And as always, the politicians are also at work—even in Washington. President George Bush came to Nebraska to gain stature as an environmentalist. But why Nebraska? He could have gone to Chicago, Los Angeles, New York, or just about any other major city for a political statement about his commitment to clean air.

Audiences would have been larger. They're the folks choking on polluted air—not us.

Bill Wells, president of American Eagle Fuels, believes President Bush came to Lincoln, Nebr., because Wells's company has a gasoline additive that will help the President make good on his commitment to clean air.

And judging by the speech that Bush made, the President was grateful to Wells for the new product—ETBE or ethyl tertiary butyl ether. He mentioned the product many times in his speech, and said he wanted ETBE to become a household word.

Okay. ETBE needs ethanol and a substance called isobutane to become a household word. Nebraska has a lot of corn and a stable supply due to irrigation for providing the ethanol. Kansas is the third largest producer of butane for making isobutane behind Texas and Louisiana. And both Kansas and Nebraska have the cattle to consume the high-protein byproduct of ethanol production.

One other ingredient is required. It's a bacteria called Zymomonas mobilis which ferments grains. A special strain of this bacteria is needed, and it comes from the University of Queensland in St. Lucia, Australia.

Brewers make strong beer with this bacteria. It has an advantage over yeast because there is a greater yield of alcohol. American Eagle's Wells points out that by using the bacteria, 10% more alcohol is produced over conventional bacteriums used.

One and one-half years ago Wells, who hails from Texas and has a PhD in inorganic chemistry from the University of Texas-Austin, and others involved in bio and chemical technology made their decision that Nebraska was the place to introduce the bacteria. American Eagle Fuels owns the rights to use Zymomonas in making ETBE anywhere in the world.

Not only does Wells point out that Nebraska has the corn and Kansas the butane, but "Nebraskans have a history of doing things new," he says, "It was here that the first tax credit was granted for corn-based alcohol fuel." That was 15 years ago. Today, Wells says he feels that his company has the product that will make the most sense in the nation's energy mix going into the 21st Century.

And he hopes ETBE will certainly become a household word. As the new product was on the lips of George Bush in June, so it is hoped by Wells's company that ETBE will also soon be on the lips of everyone who burns gasoline or diesel fuel.

But promises, hopes, and reality in the ag world have come and gone. Ethanol and gasohol-blended gasolines have certainly had a stormy battle helping to fuel America's automobile energy needs.

Signs at gas stations announcing that their fuel is alcohol free still abound, even in major corn-producing areas. Automobile manufacturers still blame alcohol-blended fuel for vapor lock in engines, especially fuel-injected ones. Many people argue that it takes more energy to produce ethanol from corn than is produced.

Despite this, gasohol has managed to carve out a respectable market share. Americans pump 100 billion gallons of gasoline a year. Contained in those gallons are 116 million gallons of ethanol. Also in the total market are 100 million gallons of another fuel additive—MTBE, which is made from cheap natural gas imported into the US.

According to Wells, the critics of gasohol, as it's now made from ethanol distilled from grains, are off base. "Several years ago the federal government commissioned a scientific look at the energy required to produce ethanol and the energy the process yielded," he explains.

"It was concluded that if you took in the value of the by-products for cattle feed and the carbon dioxide produced that was readily available to plants, it was an efficient process."

On the question of vapor lock, Wells concedes that's a problem. But he also points out that car manufacturers in designing fuel-injected engines have engineered systems that often return up to 80% of the gasoline to the tank for reuse. "That gas can get awfully hot," points out Wells. "No wonder vapor lock can be a problem."

As for gas stations starting wars with each other as to which gas is better—gasohol or no-alcohol gas—Wells says. "It's the nature of a competitive business.

"Most stations are independents these days. If their supplier isn't buying gasohol from a refiner and the competition across the street is and selling if for the cheaper price, it's natural that competitive forces are going to lead to bad mouthing gasohol."

But according to Wells, the lack of gasohol supplies is exactly what causes a lot of commotion.

ETBE could solve a major problem for refiners and help deliver more ethanol-based gas to stations, claims Wells. "The problem with transporting gasohol in pipe-lines is that it has a higher oxygen content than straight gasoline. It tends to extract water in the pipeline and there's a problem with vaporization."

Wells's company and the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) have produced test results showing that ETBE has a lower oxygen content compared to gasohol. "This would make ETBE an attractive blend for refiners," believes Wells. "It would also solve another problem dealing with octane."

The president of American Eagle Fuels says that because ETBE uses ether in its make-up and is lower in oxygen content than either gasohol or MTBE, the potential for higher octane ratings is there. "Not only would ETBE help build a bridge between agriculture and the refining industry, but there's a potential for a bridge to the auto industry as well," says Wells. "It's no secret that what sells cars in the US market is high performance.

"Since engines have been built to perform without lead, a lot of that potential for increased performance has gone by the wayside. I feel that there is the possibility for ETBE to boost octane ratings and help car manufacturers sell increased performance."

Another bonus to ETBE, says Wells, is that because it's less voltitle it offers a way for the refining industry to sell expensive butane. Butane is a by-product of refining and under current strict anti-pollution regulations, it's difficult to put it back into gasoline. But according to test data. ETBE burns butane efficiently enough to meet tight air quality standards.

Refiners have also been adding what are called aromatics and oilfins (a highly combustible by-product) to up octane ratings. But the EPA is set to come down hard on the octane boosters because they are a leading cause of smog. One of three compounds, benzene, is cance-causing. Because the ether in ETBE, octaner could be boosted without blending so many of these potentially dangerous additives into gasoline. The auto and refining industries would be helped in meeting the standards set in the President's newly proposed Clean Air Act.

But ag, auto, and oil industries have too often been at odds, adds Wells. In his business role of bringing diverse groups together. Wells points out, "It has been tough selling a big refiner on a product such as gasohol when you've driven tractors into the refiner's headquarters and demanded that he use your product.

"ETBE has the potential to help everyone solve a problem and offer them something better."

Does that mean that Wells is sending a very pointed message to the gasohol industry for adjusting its approach to ethanol's mix in the energy market of the future? "Yes, it does," he says.

It's no secret that American Eagle Fuels and its president have battled in the past for a share of Nebraska Corn Board check-off dollars.

Despite the political infighting that has gone on between varied interests in the ethanol industry, one independent point of view has been made very clear. The EPA, which is charged with implementing new clean air standards, is extremely interested in ETBE.

It has already given the go-ahead to a 13 percent ETBE blend in gasoline. American Eagle Fuels feels that its new product can be blended as high as 23 percent with gasoline for maximum benefits. The EPA is reserving judgment until tests with car fleets in day-to-day driving conditions are tabulated.

This is being arranged by the company. Also being negotiated with the government is the blended-fuel tax credit which would make ETBE an attractive price alternative to straight gasoline as gasohol now is.

Wells has publicly pointed out that if the tax credit is given and the EPA gives the okay to a 23 percent ETBE blend, this would open a potential market for 3.3 billion bushels of corn being distilled for ethaels of corn being distilled for ethnol ETBE each year. That is if the 100 billion gallons of gas pumped by us had an ETBE additive.

That's a big "if" concedes Wells. Not that he isn't confident that the EPA and the tax people will give his company's product the green light.

But it's going to take forceful mandate by the President to set the regulations which would give an advantage to ETBE into motion. The big question is will that mandate come following the politically generated excitement caused by President Bush's visit to the Plains?

At least one sign from Washington points that it will come. And the direction is pointing towards ETBE and corn. Following the President's flying visit to Nebraska, a report was made to Congress by the Federal Government's Office of Technology Assessment (OTA). The gist of the report stated that the Administration's proposals for clean air would fail if a policy relying on "compressed natural gas and methanol" were followed.

The OTA study presented to Congress further stated that replacing gasoline with ethanol's competitor—methanol—would be the most expensive way to clean up air pollution.

The cost would be about $30,000/ton of air pollutants removed via methanol-blended gasoline versus $425/ton for less volatile gasolines, says the OTA.

Less volatile gasoline is what ethanol is and has been about. ETBE is an even less volatile additive, according to reports filed by the EPA.

Wells explains that he's not sure if the political process will move towards ETBE, but adds, "While President Bush was Vice President he was in charge of deregulation.

"Getting government off people's backs" was his mandate. Slapping the oil refining industry and auto makers with new clean air rules no doubt smacks of regulation. But this is a new mandate we're faced with. Our balance of trade deficit is huge. Imported oil will become an increasingly large share of that deficit.

"Clean air is becoming a rapidly shrinking renewable resource due to automobiles in our major cities. Corn is our most abundant renewable resource. I believe that ethanol and ETBE can harness that resource to renew our polluted air and help regenerate our trade deficit. Eliminating our dependence on foreign oil, and paying farmers a fair market price for growing fuel, should be a mandate that will help us clean up the air."

Now it's up to President Bush.

FARMERS USING ALCOHOL FUELS

While the nation debates the increased use of alcohol fuels for future energy needs, a number of Nebraska producers have been burning pure alcohol in various engines. The results have been good, they report.

The following producers agreed to install injection units on a variety of diesel engines. The engine trials were part of a cooperative effort between the Nebraska Wheat Growers Association and Nebraska's Central Community College.

In Imperial, Jim Haarberg has a 235 hp engine which, when fueled by diesel, pumps 1400 gal. of water per minute.

"With alcohol injection the Well's output has increased by about 175 gal./minute," says Haarberg. "Engine temperature has dropped 3 to 5 degrees. The engine runs smoother and the exhaust smoke problem has cleared up when burning alcohol."

At McCook, Ron Friehe, reports that his semi-tractor has considerably better fuel consumption with alcohol—5.05 mpg versus 4.2 mpg. He also says exhaust temperature is lower—1000° compared to 1100° when burning diesel.

Also in McCook, Randy Peters states that his 4-WD tractor with a 505 cu. in. engine runs more efficiently with alcohol.

"My tractor also has more lugging power," says Peters. "The exhaust temperature is 50 degrees cooler.

"In 250 hours of testing we've replaced burning 3 gal. of diesel fuel an hour with 3 gal. of alcohol. Our productivity has increased by two acres more an hour."

From Gurley, Leon Kriesel also notes he has improved performance with alcohol burned in his IHC 3588 4-WD tractor engine.

"There's noticeable pickup in the engine speed and power," says Kriesel. "The rpm range has gone up from around 2300 to around 2400.

"My fuel-savings figures come out about equal. The increase in performance is the strong point. With the alcohol, the engine works easier."

STATIC ENGINE TESTS OF LOW-PERCENTAGE BLENDS OF ETHYL TERTIARY-BUTYL ETHER (ETBE) IN GASOLINE

(By Peter E. Jenkins, University of Nebraska-Lincoln and William J. Wells and Calvin T. Harling, American Eagle Fuels, Inc.)

Interest in ethyl tertiary-butyl ether, ETBE, as a gasoline blending component has grown among refiners for a variety of reasons. Compared to the similar methyl tertiary-butyl ether, MTBE, it has been reported to have higher octane response, lower volatility and blending vapor pressure, lower water solubility, equivalent or better distillation curve response, and higher caloric content per gallon. Under the "substantially similar" EPA ruling, aliphatic ethers up to 2.0 weight percent oxygen may be present in unleaded gasolines, corresponding to 12.7 percent ETBE versus only 11 percent MTBE. Made from the reaction of ethanol and isobutylene, stoichiometry indicates only a 9 percent shrinkage or reactants volume compared to 13 percent for MTBE and 20 percent for alkylate, these being the most likely and highest value alternatives for isobutylene utilization. Unlike the ethanol it is made from, ETBE could be shipped on pipelines and will lower the vapor pressure of gasoline it is blended into rather than raise it.

Environmental considerations for ETBE are also important. Oxygenate blends are required in winter months in both Denver and Phoenix, and other cities may follow. The substantial vapor pressure lowering of ETBE compared to both ethanol and MTBE is a positive step, but equivalent carbon monoxide exhaust reduction to 10 percent ethanol would require a 22 percent ETBE blend, both being about 3.5 weight percent oxygen. This is beyond the level permitted by the "substantially similar" ruling and would require a 211.F waiver to the Clean Air Act.

In order to determine the performance and combustion characteristics of ETBE blends to ascertain whether they make suitable fuels for spark ignited (SI) engines, static engine tests are needed to determine octane response, exhaust emissions profiles, and fuel economy. We report here, for a variety of low-percentage ETBE blends in Indolene and in-use gasolines, results of research and motor octane determinations, as well as engine performance data obtained from dynamometer studies.

PROJECT SUMMARY—ETBE PHYSICAL PROPERTIES AND ENGINE TESTING

ETBE DESCRIPTION

As documented in the supporting attachments, a new entrant in the octane race, ethyl tertiary-butyl ether or ETBE, holds great promise to become an important and highly valued component of motor gasoline in the near future. As either derivative of ethanol, this product would be initially sought for use in high quality super premium gasoline, a rapidly growing market segment currently excluded to traditional gasohol by the major oil companies in favor of a methanol derivative, MTBE. ETBE has similar octane response compared to ethanol, but has two important improvements: (1) blends of ETBE do not separate from gasoline when exposed to water, and (2) blends of ETBE lower significantly the vapor pressure of the base gasoline. Not only would refiners have a method of refinery blending ethanol and shipping it through pipelines, the vapor pressure lowering also allows blending of additional low cost and high octane butane, a pressuring agent normally restricted to winter months. Pricing for ETBE, and the ethanol contained in it, would be at octane value plus a butane credit. This contrasts with ethanol in gasohol, which is sold today at a discount to improve margins.

CLEAN AIR IMPLICATIONS

Use of oxygenates in mandate programs for Clean Air Act attainment of carbon monoxide standards (Denver, Phoenix) is also on the rise, but MTBE has captured nearly all of this market from ethanol as well. Not only is the fungible nature of MTBE cited as well as its greater availability and ease of transportation through pipelines, but also the slight vapor pressure elevation of ethanol blends which allegedly leads to increased evaporative emissions and atmospheric ozone levels is claimed as reason to prefer MTBE. This is unfortunate, because at 10 percent ethanol, gasoline contains in excess of 3.5 weight percent oxygen, giving considerably more carbon monoxide reduction than the maximum allowable 11% MTBE at only 2.0% oxygen. Supply restrictions usually hold MTBE concentrations to 5-10% in these programs, although future maximum oxygen levels will tend to push these percentages up. Even if the new waiver for 15% MTBE is allowed, this would give only 2.7% oxygen and would put an impossible strain on short MTBE supplies caused by methanol unavailability.

ETBE SOLUTION

The best solution seems to be 22% ETBE blends. These dramatically lower the vapor pressure while providing 3.5% oxygen. The ethanol contained in a 22% blend is that of conventional 10% gasohol, but without the demerits of phase separation and vapor pressure increase. Most importantly, there is no shortage of grain, now and in the future, to make the ethanol required. Under current law, however, aliphatic ethers such as ETBE can only be added to gasoline up to 2.0% oxygen. This corresponds to 12.7% ETBE. A waiver to the Clean Air Act would have to be obtained to allow 22% ETBE blends.

PRELIMINARY EVALUATION NEEDED

Considerable data will have to be gathered to have a successful waiver application. Before the most expensive tests are run, the 50,000 mile emissions system durability fleet tests, one must verify the physical properties and engine combustion characteristics of ETBE and its blends to confirm its benefits. The budget which follows estimates the costs for these vital preliminary investigations, which are listed in chronological order.

CONCLUSION

In summary, ETBE represents not only a growth market for fuel ethanol and the grain to produce it, but also the first clear pathway for ethanol to be sold into gasoline at octane value; that is, the price of gasoline plus a premium, instead of minus a discount. The track record of MTBE contract pricing will be plain to investing institutions, and even if ETBE were no better than MTBE it would receive similar pricing, making investment in new grain ethanol plants attractive. In fact, as we hope to conclusively demonstrate with this research program, ETBE is probably superior to MTBE in terms of solubility in water, octane improvement, volumetric shrinkage of reactants, vapor pressure lowering, distillation curve response, and materials compatibility. All these should add to a greater value for grain ethanol received in the form of ETBE as compared to either MTBE or fuel grade ethanol for gasohol.

FUTURE STUDIES

The separate issue of economics; whether regarding applicability of the Blender Tax Credit, improved ethanol yields through bacterial fermentation, or relative value of ethanol vs. methanol to ether manufacturers and users; is beyond the scope of this study and will be part of other investigations. Also, fleet tests will be part of other investigations. Also, fleet tests will be necessary once these preliminary examinations are completed.

EXECUTIVE BRIEFING ON ETBE AND ITS CLEAN AIR IMPLICATIONS

American Eagle Fuels is a unique partnership of government and industry. The State of Nebraska owns 49% of our company, the funds for their investment having come from a special voluntary corn check-off program. Additional support of our work has been provided by the State's corn producers as a grant. The State University here in Lincoln has also been helpful at every turn, the most visible of the efforts being executed by Professor Jenkins.

Our research and development efforts have had two goals; first, to lower the production costs of grain derived ethanol; and secondly, to improve the value received for that ethanol. To achieve the first objective, we have been developing, at our own small ethanol plant near Eagle, Nebraska, a grain fermentation process that uses a naturally selected species of bacteria instead of the usual yeast. The base technology comes from the University of Queensland in Australia, and the Animal Sciences Department here at this University performed important animal feeding studies on the protein-rich by-product distillers grains. The alcohol produced by this process is in high yield and exceptionally pure, making it ideal for further processing into ethanol derivatives, which brings us to the second part of our work.

To increase the value of ethanol, we have been developing a process to convert it from an alcohol to an ether, making it more compatible with gasoline and fuel delivery systems. This ether is ethyl tertiary-butyl ether, or ETBE for short. We have simply grafted the ethanol molecule to a common chemical found in petroleum refineries, isobutylene. The result is a clean burning, oxygenated gasoline component with high octane and low vapor pressure. ETBE can be blended with gasoline, shipped on product pipelines and stored in terminals without fear of phase separation through water contact. Our process development has been assisted by Dr. William Scheller, also a professor here in Lincoln acknowledged as the "Father of Gasohol," and by the Rohm and Haas Company, who has donated catalyst and technical support.

We have also performed many tests on ETBE, and we have come to understand that it will be as useful in improving urban air quality as it will in providing an enormous new outlet for domestic surpluses of grain and butane, which in turn can be converted to isobutylene. Use of these surpluses materials in our gasoline pool could reduce our balance of payments, reduce our dependency on imported crude oil, and reduce federal farm support program costs. As a Texan from an oil and gas producing and refining town, I understand the importance of combining ethanol with surplus butane from the natural gas and petroleum refining industries.

In the clean air area, it is well known that an oxygenated gasoline blend, containing about 3.5% oxygen in the form of alcohols or ethers, will reduce exhaust emissions of carbon monoxide by 20 to 30%, and reduce exhaust emissions of unburned hydrocarbons, which are precursors to harmful ground level ozone, by 10 to 15%. A 22% blend of ETBE delivers this oxygen level, but also much more. Its low blending vapor pressure of only 4 psi will reduce gasoline volatility by 10 to 15%, cutting down evaporative emissions and helping refiners meet EPA's new low volatility standards, while increasing their available octane to cover the loss of toxic lead from the gasoline pool. Also, as refiners remove high pressure butane from gasoline in order to meet the new standards, processing with ethanol to make ETBE will be a way to add butane back into the pool in an environmentally sound manner.

Importantly, 22% ETBE will substitute for as much as 60 to 70% of the aromatics or olefins currently in gasoline. Both of these are highly photochemically reactive, and olefins are implicated in fuel injector plugging, which leads to decreased efficiency and more unburned fuel emissions. Aromatics are toxic in their own right, and they lead to formation of the carcinogen benzene in the exhaust.

Finally, there is a net positive greenhouse gas benefit for fuel use of ethanol or its derivatives such as ETBE, due to consumption of carbon dioxide during photosynthesis of the grain growing plant.

A summary of the clean air benefits attributable to 22% ETBE blends are shown on the chart to your left.

We hope that this brief sketch has illustrated the important role which ETBE can play in energy security, farm jobs, grain and gas liquids utilization, gasoline octane enhancement and quality improvement, and most importantly—assistance in attainment of national clean air quality standards.

ARMENIAN GENOCIDE RESOLUTION

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, last week I joined Senator DOLE and more than 50 other Members of this distinguished Chamber in introducing Senate Joint Resolution 212, a joint resolution designating April 24, 1990, as "National Day of Remembrance of the Seventy-Fifth Anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915-23."

Since that time, several additional Senators have been added as cosponsors. Unfortunately, several Senators have withdrawn their cosponsorship of this worthwhile resolution. I am aware of an intensive lobbying effort by Turkey against the resolution. That lobbying has taken various forms, including telegrams and letters to Senators from Turkish-American groups and American corporations with business interests in Turkey.

The principal allegations of those who are lobbying us are: First, the Armenian Genocide did not occur; second, the Armenian Genocide resolution is an unbearable insult to our Turkish allies; and third, enactment of the resolution will destroy our mutual defense and economic relationships with Turkey.

Mr. President, these assertions are false. First, the Armenian Genocide is an historical fact of the Ottoman Empire. The reality of that genocide is well documented in contemporary eyewitness accounts. Second, the resolution refers not to misdeeds of the Republic of Turkey, but to actions of the antecedent Ottoman regime. It is no insult to modern Turkey. Third, enactment of the resolution could destroy our close relationships with Turkey only if Turkey deliberately chose to break its ties with our Nation. I cannot believe that a reliable ally would choose to do such a thing.

It is unfortunate that the politicians in Ankara have chosen their present course of action against the Armenian Genocide resolution. Instead of putting this issue to rest by a simple recognition of the historical fact, as Senate Joint Resolution 212 does, Turkish politicians and their allies deny the reality of the genocide and threaten dire consequences if Congress passes the resolution.

Turkey would do itself much good by dropping its antagonism toward the Armenian Genocide resolution. Acceptance of historical facts would not blemish the character or image of Turkey. Continued denial of those facts is injurious to world perceptions of Turkey. The world would respect Turkey more if its leaders stopped trying to obscure the awful crimes committed against Armenians by the long defunct Ottoman empire.

Mr. President, I urge Senators to cosponsor Senate Joint Resolution 212 and to encourage the Judiciary Committee to report it promptly for Senate floor action this year.

Remembrance of the slaughter of 1.5 million Ottoman-era Armenians is a positive step. It reaffirms the high value the American people place on respect for human rights and the dignity and worth of each individual human being.

DEXTER GUNDERSON

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I rise today to pay special tribute to a fellow South Dakotan, Dexter Gunderson, who unselfishly spent part of his life serving South Dakotans as State Director of the Farmers Home Administration [FmHA].

Anyone who is familiar with FmHA knows that proper administration of FmHA programs is crucial to the economy of a state like South Dakota. Thousands of our farmers and livestock producers are dependent on FmHA financing for funds to operate their farms and ranches. Towns and cities across South Dakota depend on FmHA funding for special needs, such as water and waste systems. Thousands of South Dakotans from all walks of life live in houses and apartments made available because of FmHA funding. FmHA is a vital contributor to South Dakota's overall economy.

Dexter Gunderson guided and administered FmHA programs and policies fairly and effectively during his tenure as State Director. He held his position during the 1980's—a turbulent time in agriculture. High-interest rates, low livestock and commodity prices, sinking real estate values, overproduction, adverse weather conditions, and poor fiscal policies from the preceding decade contributed to desperation in the agricultural community. What was needed was financial leadership that would be unwavering, fair and equitable.

Dexter Gunderson answered the call to duty in a most admirable fashion. He was not content just to fill the position. He always did more than he was asked to do. Dexter gave of himself unselfishly because of his commitment to his state and his fellow South Dakotans. Highly unpopular yet necessary programs and policies were implemented. A less competent leader could not have done what Dexter accomplished in the face of much adversity and public criticism. His abilities and fair administration won Dexter the admiration and support of employees within the state FmHA organization, as well as recognition from national officials.

Mr. President, I quote from a letter sent to the South Dakota FmHA office after an exit review. "The attached composite ratings on the results of the subject review conducted on your State's operations were presented to me at the June 29, 1989 exit conference. I commend you and your staff for the achievements as reflected by the superior ratings given by the Community Programs Division, Business and Industry Division, Personnel Division, and finance office-Financial and Management Analysis Staff. Much work went into these achievements. There were no marginal ratings." This letter was signed by Neal Sox Johnson, Acting Administrator of FmHA in Washington, DC.

As you can, see Dexter Gunderson was commended for a superior performance in the administration of his organization in South Dakota.

I am proud to share my respect and admiration for Dexter Gunderson with my colleagues here in the U.S. Senate. Seldom has a public servant given so much to his fellow man in the face of great adversity.

The state of South Dakota is a better place because of Dexter Gunderson. Words cannot express the appreciation I feel for his past service. I only wish more people would serve their fellow citizens as unselfishly as Dexter has.

SECONDARY SCHOOL RECOGNITION PROGRAM

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, the Department of Education recently announced the selection of 218 schools as award recipients under the Secondary School Recognition Program.

This program honors schools which have attained high standards of educational excellence, and I am especially pleased that three schools from the state of Kansas were selected to receive this award. These schools include Blue Valley High School, Topeka High School, and Leawood Middle School.

Blue Valley High School was commended as being a place where students success and well-being lie at the heart of educational activities. During a time of rapid growth, the school has maintained a 16 to 1 student-teacher ratio, and teachers are actively encouraged to undertake professional development activities. The school has developed systematic, personal home-school communications methods, and parents are very much involved with the education of their children. Participation in activities such as parent conferences averages between 85 and 95 percent.

Topeka High School [THS] was cited as being unusually effectively in serving a large racially and ethnically diverse student population. There is strong student participation in problem solving. Reviewers took particular note of the strong sense of "family" which pervades the school, observing that this is a unique strength for a large urban school. As a one-time member of the THS family, I take a special pleasure in this award.

Leawood Middle School was described by reviewers as "one of the top middle schools in the country." There is strong community support for the school. The response rate to requests for parent volunteers exceeds 50 percent, and participation in activities such as parent conferences is even higher. Both teachers and students arrive early and stay late at school in order to work together on academics and activities.

The common denominator among these three schools is their emphasis on creating a community spirit. They have recognized that the key to success is the active involvement of all parties—students, teachers, parents, administrators, school board members, and community residents. Each participant is seen as an important part of the quest for excellence. Everyone who has contributed to the success of these schools is to be commended and can take enormous pride in the recognition given their efforts by the Department of Education.

S. 1754. A bill to amend the Solid Waste Disposal Act (42 U.S.C. 6901 et seq.), and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL ACT AMENDMENTS ACT

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the disposal of solid waste in this Nation has reached a breaking point. In the next 10 years, one-third of our landfill capacity will be full. At the same time, waste generation has increased by 80 percent since 1969. Each of us, on average, throws away 3.6 pounds of garbage every day—enough annually to fill a convoy of 10-ton trucks 145,000 miles long, more than seven times the circumference of the planet.

Currently, around 75 percent of our garbage is deposited in landfills, while 11 percent is recycled and 13 percent is burned in waste-to-energy plants. Despite the imminent collapse of our existing solid waste disposal system, Mr. President, most States have not devised programs to reduce their waste stream or implemented programs to increase recycling of reusable products.

In Pennsylvania, New Jersey, West Virginia, Kentucky, and other States, the problem is more acute. In those States 100 percent of existing landfill capacity will be full—to the brim—in the next 5 years. And many more States will exhaust their landfill capacity in the next 10.

Since we are making far too little progress in reducing the generation of solid waste, these States will shortly have to take extreme steps—siting many new landfills, building tremendous numbers of incineration facilities, or worse, moving the problem to some other State and dumping the waste there.

Last year, Congressman BILL GOODLING and I asked the General Accounting Office to review those Superfund sites which are also sanitary landfills. In my State of Pennsylvania, 24 of our 77 landfills are already Superfund sites and 3 of those have been given permission by the State to expand further. New York, New Jersey, and Wisconsin also had more than 20 Superfund landfills.

Mr. President, the continued generation of solid waste will certainly lead to more landfills. If we continue to exercise haphazard control over where these landfills are sited and allow States to do as they please in managing their waste, I can assure my colleagues that there will be more Superfund sites, in more States.

Today, I am introducing legislation to require each State to create a comprehensive management plan to reduce the growing amount of waste in their own State, and to penalize States that act irresponsibly and try to dump their garbage in their neighbor States.

Under my legislation, the plan which each State must develop and provide to EPA must include:

First, a thorough estimate of the amount of municipal and commercial solid waste and waste residuals generated, by type of waste, projected for the next 20 years.

Second, a clear statement of degree to which recycling and source reduction will affect the volumes.

Third, a comprehensive analysis of the State's capacity to manage the identified wastes and whether the treatment or disposal facility meets current environmental standards.

Fourth, the methods by which the State plans to have new capacity available by their planning dates.

Fifth, the amount of waste the State will accept from other States or send to other States. In addition, each State must certify that based on their State plan and based on any agreements made with other States, they will have adequate capacity to manage all solid waste for the next 20 years.

Further, our legislation deals strongly with those States which do not comply. If a State fails to develop a plan and certification in a timely fashion, or fails to implement its plan, the State could lose a significant portion of its Federal highway funds.

No State may dispose of its waste in interstate commerce without an agreement with the receiving State. Violations of this provision are subject to a $50,000 fine.

And the consent of Congress is given to agreements among States to dispose of solid waste.

Mr. President, I recognize that these requirements are stringent and are intolerable of noncompliance, but we must address—strongly and promptly—a problem that literally threatens to engulf and swamp us. Each year, we must find ways to dispose of over 250 million tons of residential, commercial, and industrial waste. We're almost out of space to put it in, and yet the amount of waste has been increasing, not decreasing.

My legislation provides real incentives and real penalties for States to meet the challenge and get their solid waste problem solved. I urge my colleagues to join us in cosponsoring this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1754

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Solid Waste Disposal Act Amendments Act of 1989".

AMENDMENTS

SEC. 2. (a) Section 4003(a) of the Solid Waste Disposal Act (42 U.S.C. 6943) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(7)(A) The plan shall include provisions setting forth—

"(i) the amount of municipal and commercial solid waste and waste residuals, which will be generated in such State for the next 20 years, including the types of waste;

"(ii) a clear statement of degree to which recycling and source reduction will affect such amount so generated;

"(iii) the State's existing capacity to manage such amount of waste by treatment or disposal facilities which meet existing environmental standards;

"(iv) the methods by which the State plans to have new capacity available by its planning dates; and

"(v) the amount of solid waste the State will accept from other States or send to other States.

"(B) In any case in which a State, upon the expiration of the 24-month period following the date of the enactment of this paragraph, does not have an approved plan, as modified by the requirements of this paragraph, or fails to submit its certification pursuant to subsection (e), the Secretary of Transportation shall withhold 20 percent of the amount required to be apportioned to such State under each of the paragraphs (1), (2), (5), and (6) of Section 104(b) of title 23, United States Code, for each year that the State fails to have an approved plan, as so modified, or has failed to give such certification.".

(b) Section 4003 of the Solid Waste Disposal Act (42 U.S.C. 6943) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(e) CERTIFICATION.—(1) Within 24 months following the date of the enactment of this subsection, each State shall certify to the Administrator that such State, based on its plan, or on agreements made with any State or States, or both, will have adequate capacity to manage all solid waste generated in that State for the next following 20 calendar year period following the date of such certification.

"(2) In any case in which a State fails to manage its solid waste in accordance with its plan and certification in any calendar year, the Secretary of Transportation, with respect to the first such calendar year, shall withhold 20 percent of the amount required to be apportioned to such State for the next following calendar year under each of the paragraphs (1), (2), (5), and (6) of section 104(b) of title 23, United States Code. For each calendar year thereafter in which such State so fails, the Secretary shall withhold, from such amount required to be apportioned to such State for the calendar year next following the calendar year in which such failure occurred, a percentage equal to the percentage withheld for the immediately preceding calendar year in which such a withholding took place, plus an additional 20 percent.

"(3) For purposes of this paragraph, a State shall be considered to have failed to manage its solid waste in accordance with its plan and certification, if such State, during any calendar year, is required to transport to another State, for disposal or treatment, an amount of its solid waste generated during such calendar year which is in excess of 20 percent of the aggregate amount of solid waste generated within such State within such year.".

UNLAWFUL TRANSPORTATION OF WASTE

SEC. 3. (a) It is unlawful for any State generating solid waste to transport or cause to be transported such waste in interstate or foreign commerce (as defined in section 10 of title 18, United States Code), unless such generating State is transporting or causing the transportation of such waste under a written agreement such State agrees to accept the waste for treatment or disposal.

(b)(1) The Administrator may issue an order assessing a civil penalty for any violation of subsection (a) in an amount not to exceed $50,000.

(2) The Administrator may commence a civil action for any violation of subsection (a) in any appropriate United States district court for appropriate ruling, including a temporary or permanent injunction.

(c) The consent of the Congress is given to two or more States to negotiate and enter into agreements or compacts not in conflict with any law or treaty of the United States for cooperative efforts and mutual assistance for the management of solid waste, and the approval of Congress is hereby given to any such agreement or compact so entered into.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION JURISDICTION

SEC. 4. The Interstate Commerce Commission, in consultation with the Department of Justice, shall have the responsibility to investigate and review from time to time, interstate operations and agreements involving the transportation, treatment and other disposition of solid waste for the purpose of ensuring lawful operations and agreements.

SANITARY LANDFILLS

SEC. 6. (a) On and after September 20, 1989, no sanitary landfill shall thereafter be established—

(1) within a 50 year floodplain;

(2) within wetlands; or

(3) within 2 miles of a State or national park boundary or a State or national forest boundary, or a State or national wild and scenic river or river study area.

(b) Landfills sited under authority of the Solid Waste Disposal Act shall be required—

(1) to have in place methods to detect and prevent leakage, leaching, or contamination of soils and waters beyond its boundaries;

(2) to show financial responsibility capabilities for damages resulting from its operations;

(3) to have appropriate requirements for source separation and recycling prior to disposal; and

(4) to have appropriate requirements for closure and postclosure care of landfills.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, in the interest of time I shall summarize my approach to this legislation. I am glad to join with my distinguished colleague, Senator HEINZ, in introducing this important landfill legislation. Whenever I travel through my State, in our 67 counties, I find the recurrent problem of landfills.

People of my State receive some 5.5 million tons of solid waste each year from out-of-State, and in a State which has a total remaining capacity estimated at being only 9.5 years, it is expensive. From one end of Pennsylvania to the other these problems of solid waste disposal present an acute environmental problem. Perhaps nowhere in Pennsylvania and perhaps nowhere in the United States is the problem of solid waste disposal more acute than in Scranton, PA.

In response to citizens' requests and citizens complaints about a serious garbage problem in Scranton, I visited there on August 8 of this year and found an absolutely intolerable situation where there were large accumulations of garbage presenting a serious problem to residents of suburban Scranton. There were health and welfare considerations and no realistic means to combat the problem. The difficulty arose because garbage was being imported to Pennsylvania, specifically Scranton, from New Jersey, and under existing constitutional standards for interstate travel there was no way that local government could deal with this problem.

Senator HEINZ and I responded to these concerns, have conferred, and have prepared the legislation which is being introduced today which seeks to present a comprehensive solution, and not only for the problems of Scranton, not only for the problems of Pennsylvania, but for the problems of the country because it is a major nationwide concern, and the solution which we have crafted calls for each State to formulate a comprehensive plan.

To the extent possible, Mr. President, States ought to accommodate their own problems but if that is not feasible then there ought to be a fee charged through the Environmental Protection Agency carefully calculated to reward those locales and those States which solve their own problems and to provide a fund which may compensate States which are recipients of solid waste disposal.

This legislation further calls for enforcement by the loss of moneys from the interstate federal highway fund.

This, let me candidly say, is the beginning of a very complex problem, one which has not been adequately addressed by the Federal Government either in the executive or the legislative branch. This in my judgment is a significant first step forward. I believe we should have hearings on this issue, and we should come to grips with it because it is a major problem confronting our Nation.

Mr. President, if my colleagues could have been in Scranton on August 8 and could have seen the anguish on a large group of citizens assembled there in a town hall on this terrible problem of health and welfare caused by the importation of garbage from a neighboring State, New Jersey, and if my colleagues could have heard the complaints which I have heard across my State, and doubtless many have in their States, they would realize, as Senator HEINZ and I have that this is a problem that must be addressed.

Mr. President, in the interest of time, I ask unanimous consent that my prepared statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ARLEN SPECTER TO AMEND THE SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL ACT

Mr. President, today my colleague from Pennsylvania, Senator Heinz, and I introduce legislation to devise a fair and workable solution for the nation's solid waste disposal problems.

Across the country states are experiencing the acute impact of dwindling landfill capacity and limited means to provide adequate alternative methods of disposal. As a consequence, some states no longer possessing adequate capacity, have opted for the more economical solution of shipping large quantities of their solid waste to cheaper out-of-state landfills, instead of incurring the increased costs associated with establishing new local facilities. This has given rise to the significant legal challenge of finding equitable procedures for the regulation of interstate transportation of solid waste. If a solution is not found soon, landfill shortages very likely will begin emerging throughout entire regions of this country with dire social and environmental results.

For this reason, Mr. President, we are introducing legislation which provides incentives for states to devise realistic long-term plans for handling the disposal of solid waste.

Our bill requires states to update their present solid waste management plans and provide estimates as to the amount of municipal and commercial waste they expect to generate in the next 20 years. The new plans also must contain a comprehensive review of existing landfill capacity and methods, including export of garbage, for disposing of excess waste. Each state will have 24 months, after the date of enactment, to file an amended plan with the Environmental Protection Agency in which it will certify that based on its plan, or on agreement made with any state or states, that it has made adequate provisions to manage its solid waste disposal for the next 20 years.

The legal precedent for such an approach is clear. If a state has an approved plan for complying with minimum waste disposal requirements as set forth in the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA), then the state has a priority obligation to ensure that it adheres to its plan. Local landfills receiving out-of-state waste jeopardizes the state's ability to operate within its plan, and in turn risks noncompliance with federal standards. Federal legislation would serve the purpose of imposing penalties on those states circumventing RCRA requirements and encourage them to find solutions which do not inhibit other states' abilities to adhere to their plans.

This bill contains what I believe to be a sensible approach to the challenge of finding penalties and incentives which are fair to all states. Accordingly, Senator Heinz and I advocate the imposition of a fee, to be determined by the Environmental Protection Agency, which will be imposed on each state for every ton of solid waste it exports. The fee will provide an incentive for states to find local solutions for their trash problem. Proceeds from the fee will be used to partially compensate those states receiving another state's solid waste. Another incentive called for in this legislation will be the threat of withholding highway money from those states which fail to manage their solid waste disposal in accordance with their federally certified plan.

Mr. President, we face a serious problem. Yet it is a problem which does not lack solutions. I applaud the laws and regulations already enacted by some states that are resulting in an environmentally sound and economically efficient combination of recycling, landfilling, and incineration in much the same manner as recommended by the Environmental Protection Agency as national policy.

That being the case, why do we find it necessary to propose legislation to set national standards for waste disposal? This legislation is necessary, Mr. President, because Pennsylvania and similarly situated states find that implemention of their own carefully constructed waste management plans is threatened by the burden imposed on them by disproportionate amounts of solid waste being transshipped from other states.

According to Commonwealth of Pennsylvania reports, approximately nine million tons of municipal solid waste are generated in state per year, of which one million tons are shipped out-of-state. Pennsylvania landfills now receive approximately 5.5 million tons of solid waste per year from out-of-state sources. At this rate, Pennsylvania estimates state landfills have approximately 9.5 years of capacity remaining. These alarming statistics reflect the difficulty Pennsylvania faces in implementing the recycling legislation enacted in the state last year to provide for solid waste planning.

The state legislation mandates recycling by counties and provides state funding for municipalities to achieve their recycling goals. Under the new law, at least 25 percent of all municipal waste in the Commonwealth must be recycled by January 1, 1997. Yet, how can the State of Pennsylvania, and states in similar situations, have confidence in these plans when their goals and guidelines are being undermined by the increasing accumulation of out-of-state garbage?

Mr. President, I am personally familiar with the anxiety that the landfill crisis provokes in local communities. On August 8, I met with Lackawanna County officials, envionmental group representatives, and many area residents at the Keyser Valley Community Center in Scranton, Pennsylvania, to discuss the solid waste issue. At that meeting, I heard first-hand the deep concerns expressed by area residents, and we discussed possible solutions to this problem.

One approach was the creation of an interstate compact involving Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey to address the tri-state area's trash disposal problems. At that meeting, I indicated that I would explore the regional concept as it related to solid waste disposal.

After circulating the draft compact proposal to local interested parties, I received an analysis on August 15 from representatives of a local enviromental group, Citizens Alert Regarding the Environment (CARE). CARE reported that the "compact proposal is fine and every proposal that is made is a step forward," while urging that the concept be expanded to place the responsibility for waste disposal on those states exporting solid waste. Thus, the bill we introduce today not only incorporates the original interstate compact initiative, but also includes a broader approach to better define the states' individual responsibilities in addressing the solid waste disposal problem.

Our legislation will authorize the establishment of interstate compacts that will enable states to come together and forge mutually acceptable cooperative solutions to this problem. The creation of such compacts also will address the need for states to reach agreements on the current and evolving methods for waste management. Today, approximately 76 percent of the nation's garbage is deposited in landfills while 11 percent is recycled and 13 percent is burned in waste-to-energy plants or incinerators. While these source reduction efforts are helpful, we must face the fact that landfills are and will be a necessary part of our future because not all waste can be recycled or burned. The formation of interstate compacts can help states collectively plan for the most efficient mix of source reduction methods and landfills.

One example of the use of compacts, as my colleagues are aware, was the enactment of "Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act Amendments" implemented in 1985 to tackle similar problems associated with the disposal of low-level radioactive waste. The advantage of such an approach is that states ultimately would see it as more economical, and also manageable, for regional groupings of states collectively to devise solid waste disposal programs than for states to follow independent plans. Given the many differences in solid waste generation and available landfills from state to state, I believe this to be the only reasonable approach. Thus, the bill we are introducing today contains, as I mentioned earlier, incentives in the form of fees charged on waste transported out-of-state in excess of a state's adopted plan.

As my colleagues are aware, previous attempts to regulate trash disposal have not been very successful. For example, the Supreme Court in City of Philadelphia v. New Jersey (437 U.S. 617 [1978]) found that it was unconstitutional for states to adopt statutes that closed their borders to the importation of solid waste. The Court held that trash, although it has no inherent value, constitutes a commodity. Thus, it would be a violation of the Commerce Clause for states to restrict access to their landfills from out-of-state muncipalities. Nevertheless, the theory behind this decision is that states should not enact laws to isolate themselves from national problems, which points to the need for federal guidelines and procedures for solid waste disposal that are monitored by a federal agency. In the bill Senator Heinz and I are introducing today, the Interstate Commerce Commission will be charged with oversight authority to monitor states' compliance with federal guidelines.

Mr. President, some of my colleagues from states less affected by trash disposal problems may question the need for a federal solution to what they see as a local problem. The facts, however, clearly reflect the rapidly worsening situation arising from insufficient landfill capacity and its threat to the environment.

The Environmental Protection Agency estimates that there were almost 6,000 municipal solid waste landfills in operation nationwide in 1988. Of those, more than 2,000, or one-third, are scheduled to be closed within four years. The U.S. Conference of Mayors also estimated that more than half of our cities will have exhausted their landfill capacity within the next ten years.

Information obtained from the National Solid Waste Management Association (NSWMA) cites three cases in densely populated Northeastern States which further highlight the problem:

"By 1995, according to the New York State Legislative Commission on Solid Waste Management, all landfills currently operating within that state will reach their capacity and close. Since 1982, in fact, the number of facilities has declined from 500 to fewer than 270, while only one interim site has been opened.

"Since 1976, the number of landfills in New Jersey has decreased from more than 300 to fewer than 100, 12 of which provide over 90 percent of the state's remaining capacity. Faced with what the National Solid Waste Management Association terms "an acute shortage of disposal space." 11 counties must send their garbage to out-of-state facilities. Over half the state's refuse is presently "exported" to other regions.

"Officials at the Connecticut Department of Environmental Protection have calculated that most of the state's landfills can operate for only two more years. Already, 50 percent of all solid waste in the state is deposited in only nine major facilities."

This impending shortage appears even more problematic given trends in the composition of household refuse—increased use of non-biodegradable plastics and other artificial materials which take up valuable disposal space. Records indicate that Americans throw away almost 160 million tons of trash each year, or nearly 3.6 pounds per person daily. Some experts predict that this trend will increase to six pounds per day by the end of the century.

Mr. President, it would not be productive to point a finger at other states and municipalities with solid waste disposal problems. As I described earlier, Pennsylvania faces acute landfill shortages of its own. The pervasive national dimension of this impending crisis suggests that a passive response which assumes the problem will work itself out at the state level is patently insufficient. Current national capacity is so limited that one state's crisis today will most certainly become its neighbor's tomorrow. One solution is to encourage states to coordinate their solid waste disposal plans, which is the basis of the legislation we propose today.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to join in support of this legislation so we can address the serious national problem of solid waste disposal.

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 1755. A bill to amend title 32, United States Code, to authorize Federal support of State defense forces; to the Committee on Armed Services.

FEDERAL SUPPORT OF STATE DEFENSE FORCES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, as a strong supporter of preparedness in the common defense of our Nation, I rise today to introduce legislation which would authorize Federal support of State defense forces. This legislation will not cause increased Federal spending, but will contribute to the preparedness of our Nation and our States in times of national emergency.

Mr. President, I venture to say that many of my colleagues are not aware that 23 States have some form of State defense force, nor are they aware of the hundreds of citizens who are involved in this patriotic service. The history of the State defense forces goes back to World War I when it was called the "Home Guard" and its primary function was to assume the duties of the National Guard units that were activated.

In 1940, a model State Guard Act was developed, and throughout World War II the State Guard performed such vital functions as coastal defense and installation security against sabotage. After the war all State forces, except the National Guard, were banned. With the beginning of the Korean war, "temporary" National Guard units were set up to replace those Guard units which were federalized. The Korean experience resulted in the Congress amending title 32, to allow the States to set up State defense forces.

Today, the mission of the State defense force is to back up the National Guard. This backup is mostly for problems of domestic security—such as crowd control or use during natural disaster. During times of National Guard callup—which happened 249 times during fiscal year 1989—the State defense forces are the only organized forces available to the Governor to react to emergency situations.

Mr. President, the State defense forces are supported entirely by the State although, in many instances, individual members of the force pay for their own uniforms and equipment. Despite State support, the State defense forces often do not have personnel qualified to train new personnel. Virtually all are poorly equipped and some do not have any equipment at all. The legislation I am introducing today will help address these problems. With the passage of this bill:

The Army can issue or sell surplus supplies and equipment;

Retired military personnel, who do not have any other mobilization mission, will be allowed to join State defense forces so that, at least during peacetime, their experience and expertise could be used by the defense forces for the training of others;

The Army can lend training manuals to the State defense forces;

State defense forces may use Army training facilities when there is room for them;

State defense force personnel may attend active training schools when there is room. This training will normally be funded by the State; and

The National Guard Bureau may help States with organization and mission definition of the State defense forces.

Mr. President, there is no doubt that the State defense forces perform a vital function. My legislation does not attempt to justify the mission—the mission exists. This bill—without adding to the budget—will allow the State defense forces to be equipped, trained, and organized in order to contribute to the preparedness of our Nation. As we enter a period of constrained defense budgets and possible reduction of active force structure, National Guard callup in the event of a national emergency is more likely. With a prepared State defense force, we need not be concerned about who will assume the functions of the National Guard.

Mr. President, before I went into World War II, I happened to have been a member of the State Defense Force of South Carolina. They are all volunteers, unpaid and trained in order to assist our State to be prepared to take care of emergencies if and when the National Guard is called out.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this bill, and ask unanimous consent that a copy of this legislation appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1755

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. FEDERAL SUPPORT OF STATE DEFENSE FORCES

(a) IN GENERAL.—(1) Title 32, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new chapter:

"907. Federal coordination.
"908. Non-Federal status.
"909. Security clearances; criminal history information.

"§ 901. Definitions

"In this chapter:

"(1) The term 'State defense force' means a military force defense force organized by a State to serve as a State military reserve force that would train to become actively operational when the State National Guard forces are federalized or otherwise not available in or adequate to the needs of the State. A State defense force need not be so named by the State to be a State defense force for purposes of this chapter.

"(2) The term 'State' includes the District of Columbia and any territory or commonwealth that has an organized National Guard.

"(3) The term 'national emergency' means an emergency declared by the President or the Congress.

"§ 902. General Policy

"(a) State defense forces are considered to be in the national interest as a reserve force of the several States—

"(1) to maintain public safety and order;

"(2) to protect essential resources and facilities;

"(3) to combat terrorism; and

"(4) to perform essential services when National Guard forces are federalized or otherwise not available or adequate to the State.

"(b) State defense forces meet an essential need of the Nation and are in the interest of National security.

"§ 903. Membership

"(a) Qualifications for membership in a State defense force shall be determined by the State sponsoring the defense force. A member of the armed forces may not be a member of a State defense force unless such membership is authorized under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense or, in the case of the Coast Guard, by the Secretary of Transportation. Membership in a State defense force does not exempt any person from the provisions of the Military Selective Service Act or from any military duty or service that such person may be required to perform by virtue of membership in the armed forces.

"(b) A State may require an oath of allegiance to a chief executive of a State before a person becomes a member in the State defense force of that State. Any such oath shall include an affirmation of support for the Constitution of the United States and shall not include a provision that would limit a person's appointment or enlistment in an armed force.

"(c) Membership in a State defense force may not by itself limit a person from enlistment or appointment in an armed force.

"§ 904. Arms and equipment

"(a) The Secretary of a military department may issue or loan to a State such equipment, small arms, and uniforms as may be necessary for its State defense force to train and perform such functions as may be designated by the Governor and approved by the Chief of the National Guard Bureau. The issuance of any such items may be made on a reimbursable basis if determined appropriate by the Secretary concerned. Items issued or loaned under this subsection may be made only from items that are excess or obsolete for the needs of the military department concerned.

"(b) The Secretary of Defense shall prescribe policies and procedures to carry out subsection (a). Such policies and procedures shall—

"(1) ensure that items specified in subsection (a) may not be issue or loaned if to do so would affect adversely the readiness of active or reserve forces; and

"(2) provide that when any property issued or loaned is no longer needed by a State defense force, it shall be reported to the Secretary of the military department concerned and that any subsequent disposal of such property shall be carried out in accordance with the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949.

"§ 905. Uniforms: sale and wear

"(a)(1) Notwithstanding chapter 45 of title 10, a member of a State defense force may wear a uniform normally prescribed for wear by members of an armed force if—

"(A) the uniform as prescribed for wear by members of the State defense force includes distinctive devices or accoutrements identifying it as a uniform of a State defense force;

"(B) such uniform does not include a designation bearing the name of an armed force; and

"(C) The Secretary of the military department concerned approves State regulations for the wear of such uniform.

"(2) Before approving State regulations, the Secretary of the military department concerned shall ensure that such regulations include provisions regarding manner of wear of the uniform and periods of wear in such a manner that the wearer of the uniform will not tend to discredit that armed force.

"(b) Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, the Secretary of a military department may sell uniforms, items of uniforms, indicia of grade, and individual equipment to members of State defense forces.

"(c) A former member of the armed forces, a member of the Retired Reserve, or a regular member who is retired may wear such decorations and medals awarded for military service or valor on the uniform such person wears as a member of State defense force.

"§ 906. Training assistance

"(a)(1) Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, the Secretrary of a military department may provide training and training assistance for State defense forces. Such training and assistance may include—

"(B) the use of Federal military training facilities;

"(C) attendance at service schools on a space-available basis; and

"(D) the services of active or Reserve members of the armed forces skilled in training.

"(2) Transportation and travel expenses are not authorized members of the State Defense Forces for any training under this section.

"(3) The Secretary of the military department concerned may establish priorities and conditions for the provision of the training authorized by this subsection.

"(b) Under regulations prescribed by the President, an executive department or an independent agency of the Federal Government may provide such training and training assistance to a State for the State defense forces of that State as is in the interests of national security and not detrimental to the primary operational requirements of the department or agency concerned. Training under this subsection may be of the same quality as the training authorized by subsection (a) and shall be with the agreement of the Secretary of Defense.

"(c) The Secretary of a military department and the head of a department or agency referred to in subsection (b) may require reimbursement from a State for the cost of providing training or training assistance to the State defense force of that State. Reimbursement normally should be required in the case of training provided a member of a State defense force for a period exceeding 14 days.

"The Chief of the National Guard Bureau shall serve as the means of communication between a State and the Federal Government on matters involving the State defense force of such State.

"§ 908. Non-Federal status

"A member of a State defense force is not a member of the armed forces or an employee or agent of the United States for any purpose, including legal liability or legal defense. Any such member is responsible to the State sponsoring the defense force. A member of a State defense force who is injured or who dies while performing training or duties on behalf of the State defense force may not be provided military or federally sponsored health care, other than emergency care. Federally sponsored disability and death benefits may not be provided as a consequence of a person's status as a member of a State defense force.

"§ 909. Security clearances; criminal history information

"(a) The Secretary of a military department may conduct such background investigations as the Secretary determines necessary and appropriate as a condition to allowing access to classified information by a member of a State defense force.

"(b) A State sponsoring State defense force is encouraged and requested to make available to officials of the State defense force the criminal history information described in section 520a of title 10. The State defense force should maintain a record of criminal history information pertaining to a member in order that security clearances may be expedited in time of mobilization or national emergency.".

(2) The table of chapters at the beginning of such title is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"9. State Defense Forces ..... 901".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—(1) Subsection (a) of section 109 of title 32, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) In time of peace, a State or territory, Puerto Rico, or the District of Columbia may maintain no troops other than those of its National Guard, a naval militia authorized by chapter 659 of title 10, and defense forces authorized by chapter 9 of this title.".

(2) Subsection (b) of such section is amended by striking out "by subsection (c)" and inserting in lieu thereof "by chapter 9 of this title".

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

INTERNATIONAL PANEL ON UNESCO

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues a report on an issue of great significance to the United States. Five years ago the United States withdrew from the U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization [UNESCO]. Ambassador Jean Gerard, the U.S. representative to UNESCO, gave three reasons for the decision to withdraw: The increasing politicization of UNESCO, the corruption which had crept into the financial and recruiting practices there, and the attitude of the Director General at the time, Mr. Amadou M'Bow, who consistently expressed anti-United States views. A further significant reason was the assault on the free flow of information under the rubric of a "New World Information and Communications Order."

Today UNESCO is under new leadership and has instituted many reforms. The new Director General, Federico Mayor, is a distinguished biochemist from Spain. I have met with Director General Mayor. He is a serious man, and he appears to recognize how far UNESCO had strayed from its substantive mission.

Because of the recent changes at UNESCO the United States can once again consider rejoining. This question is being discussed in many forums. Last April I presided over a hearing before the Committee on Foreign Relations which explored the changes being made at UNESCO. Recently hearings were held in the House. Now the United Nations Association-USA has released the conclusions of an important new study which was conducted under the leadership of the extremely distinguished former Senator from Vermont, Robert T. Stafford. The study analyzes the stake which the United States has in the activities of UNESCO. Another study, to be released shortly, will address directly the question of whether the United States should rejoin the organization.

Because of the importance of this issue, the high quality of the report and the distinction of the members of the UNA-USA panel, I believe that the report and its conclusions deserve close attention, and I ask that the contents of the report be printed in the RECORD.

IN THE MINDS OF MEN

(Summary of Findings of the Report of the International Panel on UNESCO)

If the architects of the U.N. system had not thought to create a UNESCO in 1945, some such institution would have to be created today. The problems and needs in the sectors addressed by UNESCO—education, science, culture and communication—are by now inescapably international.

In its first years UNESCO compiled an impressive record as the intellectual center of the multilateral system, enjoying high prestige and access to intellectual circles around the world. But to recall what UNESCO was only underscores the dramatic deterioration since. While its core programs have continued, a sense of the organization's greater purpose and public respect for its competence have faded; the departure of three member states in quick succession was more symptom than cause of the agency's troubles. The world community has had to reexamine what it expects of UNESCO and the means by with UNESCO can fulfill those expectations.

UNESCO's primary role must be one of energizer and catalyst, a generator of ideas for concerted action among professional communities and governments rather than an administrator of sprawling programs. This role demands access to the leading thinkers and practitioners in UNESCO's fields. For an organization like UNESCO their defection is the most deadly by far. If UNESCO's only constituency is government bureaucracies, its creative spark will be gone and its usefulness spent. In fact, the intellectual communities' commitment to the agency has weakenened as UNESCO's performance has seemed to slacken.

OPPORTUNITY AND PURPOSE

At UNESCO a process of renewal is already under way, restoring some measure of confidence about the agency's competence and potential effectiveness. To sustain this, UNESCO must have a program relevant to the interests and needs of the professional and intellectual communities both in developed countries, where these communities and their networks are well established, and in developing countries, where UNESCO must nurture their growth and independence.

Of course, it is important to recall the budgetary realities that sharply limit UNESCO's reach. With a regular budget of only U.S. $175 million a year, the agency cannot be expected to furnish a remedy for every transborder problem that falls under its umbrella. This is a caution that Director-General Federico Mayor has wisely elevated to a first principle of his reform program: Do less to do better.

Still, after the sharp program curtailments of 1985-6, the panel recommends approval of the modest (2.5 percent) real budgetary increase the Director-General has requested for program "reinforcement" in the next biennium. Such an increase would be a sign of returning confidence in the agency and its improved management.

Acknowledging the financial constraints, the panel notes several areas in UNESCO's fields of specialization that merit the organization's attention in coming years:

Education

The 1980s were not a good decade for this core UNESCO concern, with many countries slashing education expenditures as part of debt adjustment programs. UNESCO often seemed on the sidelines, making little impact on the policy debate. Furthermore, one of UNESCO's principal weaknesses was shown to be its shallow roots in the education sectors of developed countries.

For UNESCO to be truly relevant worldwide it must be a global resource to feed new thinking—even leaking fresh ideas past the defenses of educational bureaucracies, whether state or professional. At the same time, it must work closely with these bureaucracies on priority programs, of which the promotion of literacy is obviously the most urgent. The panel views adult education (including maintenance of literacy skills and exchanges of research on "functional illiteracy"), the education of ethnic and racial minorities (of growing urgency in the developed countries) and the measurement of student ability and achievement as other important areas for UNESCO activity. UNESCO should help to spark wider dialogue on a number of other areas where it has a comparative advantage—science education, core school curricula, teacher training and qualifications, and interculturral studies.

Science

UNESCO is the only overarching agency that deals with "pure" as well as applied science and reaches across all scientific disciplines. It is also the one international agency that helps to promote the development of science—and particularly of a "scientific culture"—in countries where it is not yet rooted. The strengthening of nongovernmental scientific organizations in Third World countries must be a conscious priority of UNESCO's science program.

Topping the world's scientific agenda at the end of the century are problems of environmental quality and sustainability. UNESCO is the one multilateral agency that works with all the research disciplines relevant to environmental problems, and it has long organized scientific collaboration in these fields. While continuing to promote research, the organization must now forge clearer lines of cooperation with the U.N. Environment Programme. UNESCO has had less success in its social science program, yet sound research on the human impact of environmental problems is required before workable policy responses can be devised.

Culture

UNESCO's activities in the cultural sector are well managed and successful. However, because of political demands UNESCO's resources—even the "resource" of undertaking an international safeguarding campaign—have been spread too thinly.

Communication

The panel concurs with the emerging consensus in UNESCO's governing bodies that the organization must move beyond the confines of the "new information order" debate to "a new strategy on communication" if it is to meet the urgent communication challenges of the 21st century. Indeed, the rapid development of communication technology, which is thrusting UNESCO into the role of global switching point to access data bases worldwide, could make much of the debate of the 1970s obsolete and raises other fundamental issues about which UNESCO should encourage new thinking.

The panel sees two distinct but compatible principles as essential underpinnings of UNESCO's communication program, neither limiting the other: (1) defense of the "free flow of ideas, by word and image," and (2) remedying serious imbalances in communication capabilities around the world that keep information and ideas from entering the international flow. UNESCO's efforts to increase diversity and improve the balance should include training and support for independent print and broadcast facilities, and in particular for independent journalists.

The panel sees a fundamental issue emerging in the new information technology: the potential "commodification" of information. More and more, international flows of information services are being placed in categories of conventional trade and treated simply as commercial issues. But the impact of communication on culture in general is so profound that it should also be viewed in a context broader than trade. Distinguished scholarship is a prerequisite for informed debate on the implications of these issues.

Human rights

UNESCO has a constitutional mandate to promote universal respect for human rights and diffuse worldwide a human rights cultural awareness. The agency's efforts seem to have lost momentum over the past decade. UNESCO needs closer relationships with leading nongovernmental human rights groups, it should look more often to outside organizations than to its permanent staff when it comes to carrying out program activities, and it should do a better job of coordinating its work with other international human rights units.

UNESCO's procedure for hearing rights complaints was reasonably successful a decade ago, but governments charged with violations now seem to treat it less seriously. The secretariat should solicit recommendations from nongovernmental human rights organizations about ways to improve its effectiveness and the Executive Board should take up long-stalled cases in public sessions.

WHOLENESS

It is clear that the emerging issues in UNESCO's several fields of competence present challenges that national governments cannot meet by acting alone. It is also clear that UNESCO's effectiveness in meeting these challenges depends in part on the active participation of the leading nations that withdrew from membership in the mid-1980's. Although the organization has demonstrated it can survive without them, it survives severely disabled.

The panel members from the other regions of the globe welcome the findings of their American colleagues that a return to UNESCO is important to America's interests in the multilateral system. It is inconceivable that the United States would have interests in science, culture, education, and communication so different from those of the rest of the world that it could not participate in the one U.N. agency that looks after these sectors.

RICHNESS OF PARTICIPATION

Were the United States, Britain, and Singapore to rejoin UNESCO, the organization would regain its universality yet remain an underperformer. The organization requires a fundamental structural reform to realize its mission fully.

The key to UNESCO's success is professionalization: Agency decision-making must embrace the expertise and commitment of professionals in all UNESCO's fields of competence. Characteristically, the organization's most successful efforts have been in those areas—science prominent among them—in which the relevant professional communities have been involved in every aspect of the program, including management. UNESCO's governing bodies should define broad program guidelines and appropriate funds among the major program areas, leaving specific allocations within program areas to the secretariat on recommendations of expert oversight councils in each sector.

National commissions

UNESCO's founders had hoped that national commisions would enable the agency to forge grassroots ties to the world's professional and intellectual communities. The quality of the national commissions, however, is very uneven. The panel believes they must be strengthened by requiring that most members be drawn from outside government ministries, designated directly by their institutions and associations, with periodic review by the Executive Board of each member state's national commission to ensure it is validly constituted. Nominations for the Executive Board should be considered by the General Conference only if they originally emanate from validly constituted national commissions. A formal process of consultations by Executive Board members with the national commissions of their own and neighboring countries should be established.

The executive board

An organ originally intended as a small "executive" body of distinguished persons has become an institution of such unmanageable size and agendas that it cannot effectively fulfill the functions originally entrusted to it. The length of Executive Board meetings is excessive—and a strong disincentive for individuals of distinction and responsibility to consider serving on it.

Substantial restructuring is required. The panel recommends the reallocation of work within the Board to shorten its meeting periods and endow it once again with a genuine oversight function. It should meet once a year, with virtually all of its time devoted to meetings of its committees and commissions for detailed review of the organization's programs; the work of these panels should not be rehashed in plenary sessions of the full Board.

The Bureau of the Board, an existing body of 12 members, should become its nerve center, reviewing and integrating the various commission reports and maintaining close oversight of the secretariat's work and the agency's program. The Bureau should prepare the agenda of the General Conference and act as the Board's search committee for candidates for Director-General.

To encourage the highest quality of members on the Executive Board, the network of international nongovernmental organizations should evaluate candidates to be presented to the General Conference. Board members should be permitted to serve two consecutive terms, and the Board should have a core staff of its own. Fundamental structural reforms will enhance the quality and stature of the Executive Board—and its effectiveness.

The general conference

UNESCO's supreme legislative body, the General Conference, also needs—and should welcome—a streamlining of its proceedings to lighten its workload and shorten its sessions, drawing on the experience of other specialized agencies.

The General Conference should transfer responsibility for a number of administrative, financial, and personnel matters to the Executive Board. It should concentrate its most important policy-making business in a few days, scheduling together the kind of priority items that should command the attention of top-ranking government ministers and other delegates of distinction whose time is previous.

Finance

Since overall budgetary authorizations can become a divisive issue, the panel suggests that the General Conference create a formal mechanism through which major and minor contributors, enjoying comparable negotiating power, can reach early agreement on a spending ceiling. For the immediate future, in expectation that large contributors may return to membership after the 1990-91 budget and assessments are fixed, the General Conference should authorize the creation of a separate account for any unanticipated revenues, to be used primarily for nonrecurring expenses.

Effective direction

Director-General Mayor has initiated far-reaching reforms that hold the promise of restoring professionalism to the management of the agency. There is some evidence, however, that the agency may need a single management alter ego to the Director-General. To ensure freshness and innovativeness in the top job, a limitation to no more than two successive terms for the Director-General seems appropriate.

An intellectual center

It is essential that the organization secure some of the world's most eminent personalities in its several fields to help chart the agency's direction and shape its program. The panel recommends—perhaps initially on a trial basis—the creation of a prestigious "council of eminent advisers," composed of distinguished men and women in the areas of science, education, culture, communication, and human rights, nominated by the Director-General after consultation with the nongovernmental community, and confirmed by the General Conference. The council would advise the secretariat and Executive Board about emerging issues on which international cooperation is essential and about the research programs needed to respond to them; recommend pilot projects for the agency to initiate; control a modest budget subject to approval by the Director-General and the Bureau; and propose to the Director-General the names of experts for appointment to the sectoral oversight councils.

The council of eminent advisers would serve as the intellectual center for UNESCO, linking it directly to the leadership of the world's premier academic, research, and creative networks.

CONCLUSION

The panel believes it is essential that the world community grasp the current opportunity to reform and give new life to the U.N.'s educational, scientific, and cultural organization. Its work is important now and will become more so with the relentless globalization of problems. Despite remarkable progress in recent years, UNESCO needs to undergo an even more profound transformation with fundamental structural reform and a concentrated mission to anticipate and meet the challenges of the coming century.

NORTH AMERICAN WETLANDS CONSERVATION ACT

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, in July, the Committee on Environment and Public Works voted unanimously to report S. 804, the North American Wetlands Conservation Act. This legislation enables the United States to fulfill its commitment, under the North American Waterfowl Management Plan, to protect important wetland habitats throughout the United States, Canada and Mexico.

Countless species of waterfowl and other birds, fish and wildlife depend on wetland areas for nesting, feeding and spawning. The combined effects of drought conditions in the prairies of the United States and Canada and the continuing conversion and development of wetlands, have contributed to a wetlands loss rate of over 400,000 acres per year. This has led to precipitous declines in populations of ducks, geese, and other migratory birds.

In 1986, the United States Secretary of Interior and the Canadian Minister of the Environment signed the North American Waterfowl Management Plan. This plan is a strategy for protecting, restoring and enhancing wetland areas throughout the continent in order to restore waterfowl populations to levels of just a decade ago. In a speech before a Ducks Unlimited gathering earlier this year, President Bush expressed support for the North American Waterfowl Management Plan and for legislation designed to achieve its habitat protection goals.

S. 804 provides the structure and the funding to implement the North American Waterfowl Management Plan and protect wetlands for the benefit of all species which depend upon such habitats. Earlier this week, the House of Representatives passed legislation similar to S. 804. I urge my colleagues to lend their support to S. 804. Let's get this bill to the President.

Mr. President, an excellent article on this issue by the Director of the Fish and Wildlife Service John Turner was printed recently by the Orvis News in Manchester, VT. I ask that a copy of this article be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The article follows:

IS THERE STILL HOPE FOR WATERFOWL?

My roots are in Wyoming. I grew up in Jackson Hole where I was blessed with opportunities to develop lifelong addictions for fishing, hunting, wildlife photography, running rivers, or just wandering high country.

Like most outdoor persons, some of my most memorable wildlife encounters have involved waterfowl. Exploding ducks lifting from the cold quiet of a frosted beaver dam at dawn. The pristine cry of sandhill crane parents trying to decoy this invading fly fisherman from a new hatchling. Against a red late day sky, V'ed flocks of geese and ducks overhead announcing the final chapters of fall. These are images I want my two sons and daughters, along with future generations of Americans, to be able to enjoy for the enrichment of their lives.

Unfortunately, as I begin my watch as director of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the number of ducks making flights across our land has declined sharply. This year's projected fall flight of 64 million birds is the second lowest on record and is well under the 100 million bird flights that were common in the 1970s. In short, ducks have taken a battering during the 1980s as persistent drought—the "big dry" we call it out West—and perhaps more lasting forms of habitat loss and destruction have ravaged their breeding grounds on the vast U.S. and Canadian prairies.

As waterfowlers know all too well, the duck decline has resulted in some of the most restrictive hunting regulations of the last quarter century. These reductions in bag limits and season lengths have worked (the duck harvest was cut 50 percent last year) and are generally in effect again this year.

Most hunters understand the need for these restrictions. They are willing to sacrifice to help duck numbers recover. Many are concerned to the point they believe the very future of waterfowl hunting hangs in the balance. Beyond hunting restrictions, they are asking, what is being done for ducks?

What more hunters and all lovers of wildfowl need to know is that there is an exciting battle plan to bring ducks back to our skies . . . it's called the North American Waterfowl Management Plan. Devised by Canadian and U.S. waterfowl experts and signed into being by the two governments in 1986, the Plan proposes to do nothing less than restore fall flights of ducks to the 100 million level by the year 2000.

The Plan is a massive undertaking. Its goal is to raise $1.5 billion to restore and enhance 6 million acres of waterfowl habitat between now and the end of the century. Stopping the destruction of wetlands—the biggest factor in waterfowl declines—is what this plan is all about. The effort will play a leading role in President Bush's and Interior Secretary Lujan's excellent goal of saving the country's precious wetlands. The Plan will also yield substantial added benefits for shore and wading birds and a host of other wetland wildlife species.

I first heard about the Plan a year or so ago, but I really wasn't aware of its ambitious goals until it became a part of my portfolio when I was sworn in as Director of the Fish and Widlife Service this August. Well, I'm a believer now. The North American Waterfowl Management Plan offers our best (and maybe our last) chance to have sufficient numbers of waterfowl to maintain and improve the great sport and tradition of waterfowl hunting. I want other hunters and wildlife lovers throughout America to become believers. Everyone needs to climb aboard. The Plan will need massive levels of citizen interest and support if it is to achieve its fullest potential. The payoff is worth your involvement.

In spite of its relative anonymity, the North American Plan has accomplished a great deal in its first two years. Three dozen projects—ranging from small farmlands to huge government-owned sites—have been started from coast to coast, and many more are about to be launched. Encompassing millions of acres, these projects are focused in and coordinated under "Joint Venture" areas (see map).

What is Joint Venture? As the name implies, it is a partnership. It is important to note that these Joint Ventures are not just a federal show of the governments of Canada and the United States. Rather, the mainspring is a unique partnership that includes the states and provinces in both countries and more than 40 private conservation groups—outfits like Ducks Unlimited, the National Wildlife Federation, Izaak Walton League, and The Nature Conservancy. (The Orvis News in May reported on the partnership efforts by Ducks Unlimited and The Nature Conservancy to restore wetlands in California and South Dakota.) At a time when both private and public funds are hard to come by, this partnership is incredibly important to the Plan's success.

Some of the Plan's first money came from 12 state fish and wildlife agencies which somehow squeezed a total of $1 million out of their hard-pressed budgets to get the ball rolling. Ducks Unlimited put up a matching amount, the U.S. Government provided $2 million through the federally-created National Fish and Wildlife Foundation, and Canada raised $4 million to match the amount raised in the United States. The $8 million was then used on the Canadian prairies to begin a major habitat improvement effort in the Quill Lakes area of Saskatchewan.

Projects under the Joint Ventures aren't measured by size alone. The Ohio Divison of Wildlife is spearheading an effort to protect 5,200 acres of freshwater coastal marshes and estuaries along Lake Erie under auspices of the Plan. On a smaller scale yet, the Fish and Wildlife Service recently leased 640 acres of riceland near Kaplan, Louisiana, as a resting and feeding area for wintering waterfowl. In both cases, the size of these tracts is less significant than their importance as feeding areas for waterfowl.

Our country's participation is headed by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, whose professionals are front-line veterans in the struggle to conserve wetlands. In addition, increasingly valuable wetlands conservation work is being undertaken by such agencies as the Bureau of Land Management, the U.S. Forest Service, and the Corps of Engineers.

Private landowners, who own 66 percent of the remaining wetlands in the United States, are also pitching in. Under the Farm Bill of 1985, many farmers have agreed to protect or even restore their wetlands. Landowner cooperation and positive support have been outstanding so far in Joint Venture areas where real pick and shovel work has begun.

I'm still a greenhorn when it comes to life in our nation's Capitol, but I immediately discovered that the North American Plan and the cause of conserving wetlands have strong support in the White House, on both sides of the aisle in Congress, and with sportsmen and conservation groups in Washington, D.C.

President Bush helped set the tone when he established "no net loss of wetlands" as one of his top environmental priorities, noting that we have already lost one half of the wetlands that existed when the Pilgrims landed. Subsequently, a number of bills to increase support for the North American Plan have been introduced in Congress by Republicans and Democrats alike. Finally, in a June speech at a Ducks Unlimited waterfowl symposium, President Bush endorsed the North American Plan and set up an interagency task force under the Domestic Policy Council to help develop united Federal policy to save wetlands and, "to stop the destruction of these precious habitats."

With this kind of interest, it appears marshes, estuaries, potholes, bogs, and swamps—as well as the plant and animal communities they support—are on the verge of becoming socially and politically acceptable inside Washington's Beltway.

Still, all of us who have spent time enjoying waterfowl and countless other wetland species know that much remains to be done. You can learn about the North American Plan and become involved. Join cooperative efforts of local clubs and national hunting, fishing, and conservation groups. Your help is critical in insuring that some of our most precious wild resources don't become memories.

The future of wild wings and wild lands will be an important test of the real wealth of our society and the overall well being of our nation's environment. Ducks and geese—and all they represent, need everyone's help now. Welcome aboard.

Joint Ventures are the cooperative efforts that are the heart and soul of the North American Plan.

The six United States habitat Joint Ventures are:

The U.S. Prairie Joint Venture will protect 1.1 million acres of "pothole" habitat.

The Lower Mississippi Vally Joint Venture will protect 300,000 acres of wintering habitat.

The Central Valley Venture will protect 80,000 acres of pintail habitat in California.

The Gulf Coast Joint Venture will protect 386,000 acres of wintering habitat.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Lowlands Joint Venture is designed to protect 10,000 acres of black duck habitat.

The Atlantic Coast Joint Venture will protect 50,000 acres of breeding and migration habitat for black ducks.●

HONORING COL. JAMES C. ADAMSON, U.S.A. NASA ASTRONAUT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to pay recognition to Col. James C. Adamson, a U.S.A. NASA astronaut. Colonel Adamson will be a mission specialist for the five-member crew voyaging into space on the shuttle Columbia.

Adamson grew up in Groveland which is in Livingston County, NY. The town is thrilled as well as proud that Adamson will be venturing into space. Through the colonel's outstanding work and accomplishments, he proved his ability to be one of the five crewmembers to set out on this latest exploration on the Columbia.

Colonel Adamson is definitely one of the most qualified astronauts we have in America today. His lists of accomplishments include being a West Point graduate, test pilot, having a master's degree in aeronautical engineering from Princeton University, and serving as a Vietnam helicopter pilot. These qualifications allowed him to be 1 of the 17 new astronauts out of 5,000 applicants in 1984.

Mr. President, I would like to wish Colonel Adamson the best of luck in his space travel on the Columbia and look foward to his safe return. Thanks to him, Americans will learn tremendously from his experience.●

NO VISA FOR ARAFAT

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, the U.N. will soon hold its annual debate on Palestine. Because of this, the question has once again arisen as to whether the State Department should issue a visa to PLO chairman Yasser Arafat if he applies for one.

Some argue that with the beginning of the United States-PLO dialog, based on Arafat's statement in Geneva last year recognizing Israel's right to exist, renouncing terrorism, and accepting Security Council Resolution 242, conditions have changed and a visa should be granted. I disagree. I urge that the State Department continue to refuse to issue a visa to Yasser Arafat.

Developments over the past year have continued to raise doubts as to whether the PLO truly wants a peaceful solution to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. Arafat himself has continued to speak in terms which lay open to question the extent of his commitment to such a solution.

And just this past August, a congress of the PLO's largest organization, Fatah—which Arafat heads—issued a political program that was so extreme and objectionable that it could only lead to the conclusion that Arafat is unwilling to live in peace with an independent Jewish state.

Mr. President, I believe many Americans agree with me that Arafat should not be granted a visa. Recently, the writer George Will eloquently argued the point against letting him into the United States. I commend to my colleagues' attention Mr. Will's article.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 17, 1989]

NO VISA FOR ARAFAT

(By George F. Will)

Nine months after a diplomatic debacle, the United States is in danger of making matters worse. The Bush administration, which is relentlessly and sometimes obnoxiously eager to underscore the obvious—that it is not the Reagan administration—may well pick up where the Reagan administration left off in appeasing the Palestine Liberation Organization.

The question is: What will happen if Yasser Arafat requests a visa to visit his kindred spirits, of which there are all too many, at the United Nations?

Late last autumn, to enable it to do what it had long wanted to do—deal directly with the PLO—the State Department became Arafat's lyricist, coaxing him to sing the right (well, the State Department's idea of the right) words. The three U.S. conditions were recognition of Israel, acceptance of U.N. Resolution 242 and renunciation of terrorism. The PLO did none of the three, but feigned agonies of surrender, so State ruled that it had done all three.

The PLO slightly softened its rhetoric of implacable hostility toward Israel, hostility still enshrined in the PLO covenant, which declares Palestine "invisible" and vows "elimination of Zionism in Palestine." The PLO "accepted" Resolution 242 (as the PLO misconstrues it to require complete withdrawal to the 1967 borders).

But the PLO accepted 242 in the context of "relevant" U.N. resolutions. These—"Zionism is racism" and the rest—have the cumulative meaning of mandating Israel's destruction.

Today, as 10 months ago, the PLO, speaking to its constituencies, reassures them that its diplomatic maneuvers are merely part of a phased approach to the liquidation of Israel. The two-stage, two-state strategy is to reduce Israel to indefensible borders by means of a PLO satrapy on the West Bank, and then use violence.

Regarding terrorism, the PLO said: We never have used it, we promise to stop using it, and attacks against Israelis are not terrorism. Since then, the PLO has increased terrorism in three ways. There have been more attacks across the border, including squads from the Fatah faction. PLO radio from Baghdad incites and praises terrorism within pre-1967 Israel, such as the act of plunging an Israeli bus into a ravine. And there has been a sharp increase in murders of moderate Palestinians—89 so far—on the West Bank.

Israel has serious plans for accommodating its security needs and Palestinian political aspirations. Israelis cite as a possible model Spain's concessions to Catalan cultural and political autnomy. (Implicit in that analogy is Israeli annexation of the West Bank.) Refugee camps could be replaced by towns for $2 billion—if, say, 10 European nations would put their money (a mere $40 million each for just give years) where their mouths incessantly are. But what moderate Palesinians will come forward to negotiate? They see other moderates murdered, and the United States is worse than merely mute, it is absolving the "umbrella organization."

Concerning whether the PLO is a terrorist organization, State's position is: it cannot be such an organization because we are talking with it, and we are not allowed to talk with terrorists. State also says the PLO is an "umbrella organization" and that Fatah is one faction bound by Arafat's supposed renunciation of terrorism. How does State verify compliance? The point of the PLO "umbrella" structure is to allow appeasement-minded Westerners to say they cannot trace a thread of responsibility for Palestinian terrorism.

Six months ago, Arafat reaffirmed the PLO goal of "the complete liberation of the Palestinian soil and the establishment of a Palestinian state over every part of it." Five months ago the head of the PLO's political department said: "The recovery of but a part of our soil will not cause us to forsake our Palestinian land. . . . We shall pitch our tent in those places which our bullets can reach. . . . This tent shall then forth the base from which we shall later pursue the next phase."

Three months ago, the leader of the PLO's second largest faction said: "The establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza will be the beginning of the downfall of the Zionist enterprise. . . . [Our goal] is the complete liberation of the national Palestinian soil." Last month the Fatah conference in Tunis reaffirmed that the 1948 partition of Palestine was a "crime."

The Bush administration, which prides itself on believing that all differences are splitable, cannot imagine implacability and therefore cannot recognize it in the PLO. Or so say critics, who hope they are not proven correct by a visa for Arafat.●

PRIME MINISTER BENAZIR BHUTTO—RECIPIENT OF THE W. AVERELL HARRIMAN DEMOCRACY AWARD

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, Benazir Bhutto, Prime Minister of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, recently was chosen to receive the prestigious W. Averell Harriman Democracy Award, given by the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs [NDI]. Long recognized for its work around the world in the ongoing struggle for democracy, NDI acknowledged Prime Minister Bhutto's efforts in the restoration of democracy in Pakistan after 11 years of military dictatorship.

Unfortunately, the Prime Minister herself could not come to the United States to receive this award. Instead, the Prime Minister sent her mother and Senior Minister, Begum Nusrat Bhutto, to accept it on her behalf. No stranger to the struggle for democracy, Begum Bhutto delivered an eloquent address which I believe all Members of the Senate—and indeed all Americans—should be interested to read, and I ask that her speech be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

Begum Bhutto's words are a magnificent exposition on democracy, on the values we hold dear. They contain a timely reminder to Americans that "students and workers around the world today are quoting Madison, not Marx, Lincoln, not Lenin" as they pursue political change, and an appeal to Americans for support as Pakistan strives to give meaning to its newfound freedom.

Mr. President, I believe the new, democratic Government of Pakistan deserves that support. People all over the world know the story of Benazir Bhutto's recent rise to power, of her election as Prime Minister after years of imprisonment, harassment, and detention at the hands of the political and military opposition. Last November's elections in Pakistan were the first relatively free and fair elections in Pakistan in more than a decade. And today Prime Minister Bhutto is the first woman to lead a Moslem nation since the 13th century.

There is, however, an ongoing struggle in Pakistan to solidify democracy. Pakistan faces a myriad of problems which are not new—economic underdevelopment, rampant illiteracy, a rising scourge of drugs, and the burden of providing for an ever-growing Afghan refugee population, now numbering well over 3 million. What is new, Mr. President, is the way the Bhutto government is attacking these problems: aggressively and successfully.

In response to Pakistan's enormous economic and social problems, the first months of leadership by the Bhutto government have provided many heartening signs. The new Government of Pakistan has moved to cut spending, reduce the deficit, privatize industry, and welcome foreign investment. Inflation once in the double-digits today is less than 10 percent, and continues downward. Bureaucratic redtape is being eliminated and the private sector is once again alive with investment initiatives. A serious and sustained assault on drug trafficking has begun with criminals being arrested, prosecuted, and extradited.

Mr. President, I am proud to voice my support today for the government of Prime Minister Bhutto and for the people of Pakistan. Their dream of democracy merits our support and deserves the chance to succeed.

Mr. President, I ask that the attached speech by Begum Nusrat Bhutto be included in the RECORD at this point.

The remarks follow:

SPEECH BY SENIOR MINISTER BEGUM NUSRAT BHUTTO

Speaker Foley, Vice President Mondale, Congresswoman Ferraro, Chairman Kirk, and Dear Friends, I stand before you tonight, deeply honored and very grateful to accept on behalf of my Prime Minister—and my daughter, Benazir Bhutto—the W. Averell Harriman Democracy Award, recognizing her efforts to restore democracy in Pakistan and her commitment to strengthening democractic institutions worldwide. You will forgive a very proud mother for complimenting the Institute on its choice.

Benazir sends with me her greetings and her deep appreciation for this award, named in honor of a great American, whose contributions to the promotion and preservation of democratic values is legendary. And for Benazir to be receiving this award along with another great American, Speaker TOM FOLEY, only doubles the honor. Benazir wishes to accept this award not just for herself—but also on behalf of the millions in Pakistan—and across the world—who battled to see democracy restored to our nation.

Many of those who fought, suffered—and some—some gave their lives so that others might breathe free. In our hearts, we shall always remember them. And in rocognizing Benazir this evening, you pay honor to their sacrifice, too.

No discussion of the restoration of democracy in Pakistan would be complete without mentioning the invaluable work of the National Democractic Institute—and particularly its leadership in monitoring the November 1988 elections. For the first time in 11 years, Pakistanis were able to participate in relatively free and fair elections. And the relative absence of fraud in those elections was due in no small measure to the fine work of NDI. On behalf of Benazir, myself and millions of Pakistani men and women, long deprived of human dignity and hope, I thank you.

In Pakistan, we are emerging from a long, national nightmare into a new era of freedom and justice, but our work—and yours—has just begun. Democracy has a global agenda. And it can be found in the recent surge of democratic movements around the world, and in the calls for reform in authoritarian regimes.

Earlier this year speaking at the Harvard commencement, Prime Minister Bhutto called for the creation of a new Association of Democratic Nations. Her goal was clear and straightforward: To form an international union committed to representative democracy, committed to the notion that all governments should be accountable to the people whom they serve.

On Benazir's behalf, I reiterate that call today. Governments often have found it convenient and wise to band together, usually at times of grave external threat, and most successfully, during times of war. Indeed, the world had not suffered from a lack of international organizations.

By last count, there are over 2,650 international organizations, ranging from the grand to the mundane; from organizations dedicated to peace to organizations dedicated to cooperation in seed testing and cotton planting. But there has never been an international organization bringing together nations solely on the basis of their adherence to constitutional government and the commitment to the values of democracy.

The need for such an organization is particularly acute for the world's new democracies, for nations making the difficult transition from autocracy to freedom. The time is long overdue for those of us who believe in what we preach, to help others around the world who share our values. In South America, in Asia, in Eastern Europe—and even in the Soviet Union—the old order is crumbling in the face of democratic change.

From the politburo to the communal farm, the tender shoots of freedom are sprouting, the roots of which lie deep in the soil of the North American continent. The world is changing more rapidly than perhaps we realize. We stand as an international community confronting an opportunity, an opportunity unseen in the world for at least 70 years since the victory of democratic nations in World War I.

Today's world leaders must decide: Will they cooperate in shaping the awesome change sweeping the globe or let another opportunity go by.

The time is right for assertive action to promote democracy—for coordinated efforts to create an Association of Democratic Nations. An association committed to the proposition, manifest in the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, that "freedom is not the sole prerogative of a lucky few, but the inalienable right of all human beings." An association prepared to use the force of moral suasion and the incentive of economic action. An association to preserve democracy in nations in crisis—and to promote democracy in nations undertaking reform.

Democratic nations owe it to themselves, as a matter of self-interest, and to others, as a matter of morality, to expedite and educate, to encourage and cajole, to provide incentives and assistance in the promotion of democratic values around the world. Prime Minister Bhutto's proposal acknowledges the realities which separate nations, but gives expression to the hopes which unite them.

Freedom can be a fragile thing. Despite political and economic progress, emerging democracies confront a myriad of problems associated with development. Not every democracy organizes itself in the same way; nor does every democracy express itself the same way.

But Prime Minister Bhutto has identified two elements essential to all democracies: Elections, at regular intervals, open to all significant political parties, fairly administered and based on a broad or universal franchise and a system, both political and legal, which guarantees fundamental human rights, including freedom of expression, conscience, speech, and association.

Members of an Association of Democratic Nations could assist each other in many ways. But let us begin with the assurance of impartial elections. The National Democratic Institute has proven in Pakistan—and other nations—that the presence of observers is a deterrent to fraud. Governments tend to act more responsibly when they know the whole world is watching—and reporting. In countries without established democratic traditions, representative government is always at risk.

But an Association of Democratic Nations could balance those risks: By mobilizing world opinion, by strengthening the institutions of freedom, and by helping to build new institutions to guarantee human rights, the principles of justice, and due process of law.

Ultimately, the Association of Democratic Nations, as envisaged by Prime Minister Bhutto, could consider stronger steps: Channeling economic assistance to democracies, or applying economic sanctions against nations where freedom has been denied or diminished. Most donor nations are democracies. It is only fitting that they should nurture the values with which they have achieved political maturity and economic prosperity.

The recent effort to create a multilateral assistance initiative in support of democracy in the Philippines need to be a one-time achievement. It could be the forerunner of many such efforts organized and implemented through the Association of Democratic Nations. Criteria for assistance, agreed upon and applied by both donor and recipient nations, would have tremendous force in protecting transitional democracies. A moral framework for foreign policy, as proposed here, may be seen by some as a departure from standard operating procedure. If so, it is long overdue.

Morality, as expressed in international opinion, has played a far larger role in international relations than many seem prepared to recognize. It has played a significant role in changing the order in South America, South Asia, and now, in Eastern and Central Europe. And if morality did not intervene to save the life of my husband, Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, by the 1980's it was sufficiently strong to help save myself and my daughter Benazir—and to secure our release from prison under the previous military dictatorship in Pakistan.

The emphasis today on democracy and human rights in movements around the world is an outgrowth of an international moral consensus. Democratic structures, by providing freedom and fairness, are commendable in their own right. By providing predictability and stability, they enhance the quality of life for all. Throughout the world, liberty is on the move.

As democratic forces gain momentum in the last years of this century, the Association of Democratic Nations can take the lead in shaping the future. "A tomorrow," in Benazir's words, "better than the yesterdays we knew."

Today, we in Pakistan, as others before us, have joined you in the ranks of the world's democracies. We look, along with much of the world, to the United States, the world's greatest democracy, to help us protect our developing freedoms—to assist us in addressing new priorities. We, in Pakistan and across the developing world, seek with your help to build a new freedom, to define a new democracy.

Let Americans remember that while freedom is the universal political aspiration for all people, students and workers around the world today are quoting Madison, not Marx, Lincoln, not Lenin. It is a "government of the people, by the people, for the people" to which we all aspire.

In my husband's last letter to our daughter Benazir, written from the horror of his death cell, Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto's final words quoted Senator Robert F. Kennedy: "Every generation has its central concern, whether to end war, erase racial injustice, or improve the condition of the working man. Today's young people appear to have chosen for their concern the dignity of the individual human being, they demand a limitation on excessive power. They demand a government that speaks directly and honestly to its citizens. The possibilities are too great, the stakes too high, to bequeath to the coming generation only the prophetic lament of Tennyson: 'Ah, what shall I be at fifty * * * if I find the world so bitter at twenty-five.' "

Our legacy to the next generation must be the blessing of freedom. We can be a catalyst for democracy and a bulwark against repression. Together, I believe, we can change the world. to quote Benazir: Time, justice and forces of history are on our side. For, in the words of Islam: "Tyranny cannot long endure."

We proved that in Pakistan. Together, we can prove it all over the world. Thank you.●

VAMOS

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Vermonters are known for their concern for people in need overseas, and for their willingness to try to help those people. As chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, I can attest to the number of letters and calls I have received from Vermonters who support efforts to improve the lives of children, women, and the poor from Central America to the Far East.

I recently learned about a group of Vermonters who have been working hard to improve conditions in the lives of our closest neighbors in Mexico. Two years ago, Patty Coleman and Ike Patch visited Mexico to see for themselves poverty that they later declared as beyond their worst nightmares. They returned to Vermont and decided to establish a nonprofit corporation, Vermont Associates for Mexican Opportunity and Support [VAMOS].

The organization has collected $30,000 mostly in small donations from over 500 Vermonters. All of the money is used to directly assist Mexicans in the area around Cuernavaca, a city of 1 million people located about 50 miles southwest of Mexico City. Overhead expenses, such as printing and administrative costs, are paid by the VAMOS directors.

The money is already helping to improve the lives of many Mexicans living near Cuernavaca. VAMOS has been able to provide the small amount of resources these people need to help lift themselves out of poverty. Donations have bought sewing machines for three clothing cooperatives, equipment for a mining cooperative, start-up funds for food cooperatives that can cut a family's food cost by one-third, and day care centers to care for children of working mothers.

VAMOS has seen remarkable results from people who are given a special opportunity to help themselves. I would like to take this opportunity to commend the founders of VAMOS for their important initiative. The many VAMOS volunteers and donors also deserve a special acknowledgement for their efforts to help our neighbors in Mexico.●

NATIONAL FALLEN FIREFIGHTERS' MEMORIAL

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, 134 of our Nation's career and volunteer firefighters lost their lives in the line of duty in 1988. Services for these courageous men and women will be held at the Eighth Annual National Fallen Firefighters' Memorial Service this Sunday.

I would like to specifically mention the firefighters from Washington State who are no longer with us: Lincoln McGowan, State of Washington Department of Natural Resources-Contractor, Lacey, WA; Robert R. Sittner, Skagit County FPD No. 7, Mount Vernon, WA; and Jean Verville, State of Washington Department of Natural Resources-Contractor, Lacey, WA. The citizens of the State of Washington owe a permanent debt of gratitude to these courageous and dedicated professionals, and to their families.

Fires kill several times more Americans than all other natural emergencies combined. The cost of fires in terms of both human life and economics is tremendous. I salute these individuals and commend the courage of their families for their service to their communities, their State, and the Nation.●

IN RECOGNITION OF JOSEF GINGOLD

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues a great American, teacher, and musician, Josef Gingold. Professor Gingold will celebrate his 80th birthday on October 28, 1989.

A distinguished professor emeritus of music at Indiana University, Professor Gingold emigrated to the United States, with his family, after the First World War, beginning his formal musical education at the Third Street Settlement School in New York. Not only is he a world-renowned violinist and concertmaster, but Professor Gingold has influenced and guided several hundred professional violinists and string players who fill our great American orchestras and concert stages. In fact, the Minnesota Orchestra and the St. Paul Chamber Orchestra boast 18 Gingold students who attended his weekly master classes.

Truly an American treasure, Josef Gingold's influence on music in America as both performer and pedagogue is equaled by few. Year after year, young violinists from as far away as Australia, Asia, Europe, South America, and even from behind the Iron Curtain, travel to Bloomington, IN, for an opportunity to work with the great master. As a guest professor, he has brough the American school of violin to the Paris Conservatory, the Toho School in Tokyo, and the Britten-Pears School in England. Professor Gingold's three-volume set of orchestral excerpts is the standard text used by students and professional orchestra players the world over.

Concertgoers and music lovers everywhere have been touched by Josef Gingold and his relentless dedication to teaching. He is revered and loved by all who have had the good fortune to know him or hear his music. On behalf of his students and those who love classical music, I thank him for all that he has contributed to the advancement of his art, and wish him the very best in his 81st year.●

THE PEACE CORPS—A BIRTHDAY OF AN IDEA

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, how many of our Nation's great achievements can be traced back to their inception, that first moment an idea or thought is uttered for consideration? For instance, we recognize the day we first sent man to the Moon, but do we recall the first time we realized it could be done?

Today I would like to recognize a moment that occurred 29 years ago on October 14 at the University of Michigan. Presidential candidate John F. Kennedy asked the students gathered, "How many of you are willing to spend 2 years in Africa or Latin America or Asia working for the United States and working for freedom?" This challenge began a movement which led to the formal organization of the Peace Corps a year later.

Since that time, thousands of Americans have helped people in remote countries all over the world become more self-sufficient. The corps was created to promote peace and international understanding. It gave Americans the opportunity to educate themselves about the world, and, in turn, educate the world about the United States. For their efforts, volunteers received a monthly stipend and a token payment—or nest egg—at the end of their service.

Mr. President, people who volunteer for the Peace Corps don't do so for the money or the glamour. Peace Corps service is not used as a stepping stone for one's career. Ask someone who has served in the corps why he or she joined. Don't be surprised if the answer is patriotism or idealism, a desire to help those less fortunate or a passion to change the world.

This reasoning may sound naive in 1989 and more appropriate of the first volunteers who joined the corps in 1961. Yet I believe we are beginning to see the pendulum swing away from the "me generation" of the eighties to a more compassionate citizenry of the approaching nineties. Americans are taking a closer look at this country and realizing that the problems plaguing our Nation—drugs, illiteracy, homelessness—can be alleviated if everyone lent a hand.

There are many volunteer programs already in operation across the country that are doing a good job with their resources. But imagine what could be accomplished if every citizen gave 2 hours of his or her time every week! I'm not saying this would wipe out the demand for drugs or make everyone functionally literate, but we would be so much closer to making these goals a reality.

This year there has been a growing interest in national service, and many bills have been introduced in both the House and Senate that address this issue. There is a good possibility that one may be enacted into law this Congress. I am very much in favor of national service and have been closely considering each proposal.

I am troubled, however, that the discussion so far has focussed more on the incentives for performing service rather than the reasons why we all should offer a little of our time. I think it is time to change the "what's in it for me" mentality to "what can I do for you." Compassion cannot be mandated, nor should it be "bought" through offering housing or school loan vouchers.

If we are to develop a national volunteer corps, we should look to the reasons why the Peace Corps has been so successful in its efforts to recruit volunteers. Twenty-nine years ago a challenge was offered and our Nation responded. Since then over 130,000 individuals have volunteered their services in almost 100 countries. The Peace Corps continues to receive over 10,000 applications each year from individuals willing to share 2 years of their lives helping people throughout the world.

Today I hope you will join me in paying tribute to a simple idea that has changed the lives of so many here and abroad—the Peace Corps.●

WILLIAM D. JORDAN HONORED BY THE UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to one of Alabama's outstanding educators—William D. Jordan, a long-time faculty member of the university of Alabama's College of Engineering. In a ceremony due to take place today, the College of Engineering's Material Testing Laboratory in Hardaway Hall will be renamed the W.D. Jordan Laboratory.

Dr. Jordan has served the University of Alabama as a faculty member for 40 years. Bill Jordan has been an inspiration to the college of engineering, its faculty, its students and its alumni. Bill Jordan has spent his life in service to the college, the university and the Tuscaloosa community. This is, Mr. President, a fitting tribute for a worthy man.

Dr. Jordan's experience with the lab goes back almost 50 years, back to when he studied there as a student during his undergraduate days at the university.

Bill Jordan's interest in engineering began while in high school. After graduation, he came to the University of Alabama where he earned a bachelor of science degree in mechanical engineering in 1942, followed by a master of science degree in 1949. He received a doctorate from the University of Illinois in theoretical and applied mechanics in 1952.

From 1942 to 1946, Jordan was on active duty with the U.S. Army where he achieved the rank of captain. From 1946 to 1973 he led a distinguished career in the Army Reserves where he achieved the rank of colonel and received the Meritorious Service Medal upon his retirement.

Bill Jordan began his 40-year career with the University of Alabama in 1946, as an engineering instructor. He then climbed the academic ranks to the positions of assistant professor, associate professor and professor of engineering mechanics.

From 1961 to 1968 and 1981 to 1986, Dr. Jordan served as head of the department of engineering mechanics and from 1968 to 1981, he was the head of the department of aerospace engineering, mechanical engineering, and engineering mechanics.

Mr. President, I wish that I could be with Bill Jordan and his wife Carolyn and his three children, Lucy, Rebecca and William today to share with them and the university community this exciting event. I am proud to serve as one of Bill's representatives in Washington, and prouder still to call him my friend.●

PUT THE TRUST BACK IN THE SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUND

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, this morning I joined with the distinguished majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, and others to unveil our proposal for taking the Social Security surpluses off budget for purposes of calculating compliance with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. This leadership initiative will be a critical first step toward restoring truth in Federal budgeting. And, let's face it, until we acknowledge the truth—the scale and enormity—of our deficits, then we will continue on our current wreckless course of do-nothingism, denial, and deception.

The late John Mitchell, when he was Attorney General in the Nixon administration, used to say over and over again, "Watch what we do, not what we say." Well, the American people would do well to take that same advice if they want to understand just how desperate our current fiscal crisis really is.

Look not at what we are saying, but at what we are doing. We say that the budget deficit for 1990 will be just under $100 billion. Yet, lo and behold, at the end of this month we are going to raise the debt limit by some 300 billion dollars to allow for expected public borrowing during fiscal year 1990. Now, if the deficit is only $100 billion, why are we going to borrow $300 billion? The answer is simple. We are going to borrow $300 billion in 1990 because the true deficit, once you cut through all the monkeyshine, is going to be $300 billion. We arrive at that fanciful $100 billion projection only by indulging in enough fraud and larceny and malfeasance to land an ordinary citizen in the penitentiary.

Of course, the most reprehensible fraud in this great jambalaya of frauds is the systematic and total ransacking of the Social Security trust fund in order to mask the true size of the deficit. As we all know, the Social Security payroll tax has become a money machine for the U.S. Treasury, generating fantastic revenue surpluses in excess of the costs of the Social Security program. Excess Social Security tax revenues will be $65 billion in 1990 alone—boosted by yet another rise in the Social Security tax rate, slated to kick in January 1. By 1993, the annual Social Security surplus will soar to $99 billion.

The public fully supported enactment of hefty new Social Security taxes in 1983 to ensure the retirement program's long-term solvency and credibility. The promise was that today's huge surpluses would be set safely aside in a trust fund to provide for baby-boomer retirees in the next century.

Well, look again. The Treasury is siphoning off every dollar of the Social Security surplus to meet current operating expenses of the Government. By thus reducing the deficit, we mask the true enormity of the Federal budget crisis while creating the illusion that Congress and the administration are actually doing something about deficits.

Mr. President, our proposed amendment, which we intend to attach to the debt-ceiling bill, would put Social Security surpluses off budget for purposes of calculating the Federal budget deficit beginning October 1, the first day of fiscal 1990. The distinguished junior Senator from Texas and his Republican colleagues, aiming to rescue the administration's read my lips strategy, plan an alternative amendment that would put Social Security off budget in the distant future, in 1994.

By 1994, however, a cumulative sum in excess of a half-trillion dollars will have been borrowed from the Social Security trust fund, and the denuded trust fund will be piled high with IOU's. Those IOU's are a charming bookkeeping nicety, but the sheriff who tries to collect on them is truly going to have his work cut out for him.

The hard fact is that, in the next century, the Social Security system will find itself paying out vastly more in benefits than it is taking in through payroll taxes. And the American people will wake up to the reality that those IOU's in the trust fund vault are a 21st-century version of Confederate banknotes.

Of course, the Treasury would have the option of raising taxes to repay the astronomical sums we have borrowed from the trust fund. But that would be a brazen ripoff of working Americans, many of whom will be retirees obliged to pay a second time for the benefits they have already earned.

On the other hand, if the Treasury wimps out and chooses not to raise taxes to reimburse the trust fund, then there will be no alternative but to slash Social Security benefits. The most likely scenario is that Social Security payments would be turned into just another means-tested welfare program for the very poor; if you make more than say, $15,000 per year, then forget about collecting any Social Security benefits.

Any way you slice it, it is a lousy public policy to borrow massively from the Social Security trust fund with no credible plan for reimbursement. Of course, the immediate damage from this approach is that it allows us to mask the true scale of the Federal budget deficit, thus making it easier for us politicians to sit on our hands.

This is a gross breach of faith with the American people. Social Security is perhaps the most successful social program ever enacted by the Federal Government. Without question, it is the most effective antipoverty program in history. Social Security is not charity or welfare. On the contrary, it is a supplementary retirement fund that workers pay for with their hard-earned money.

I say it is time to stop playing games with Social Security and the Government's finances. It is time to use honest budget numbers and to make honest budget choices. By all means, let us begin by putting Social Security truly in trust and totally off budget.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my original bill be printed in the RECORD at this point:

HOUSING REFORM PROPOSAL

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, this past week marked an important and positive step for housing. Secretary Kemp proposed a sweeping reform package to turn around some of the problems that have plagues the Department of Housing and Urban Development. I commend the Secretary for responding to the urgency of this problem with an objective, responsible proposal.

With the introduction of this proposal, it is time for Congress to act. Just as we addressed the FSLIC crisis, we must move immediately to halt practices and programs which have drained HUD and the taxpayer.

As ranking member of the Senate Banking Committee, I hope to join the chairman of the committee, Senator RIEGLE, to advance Secretary Kemp's housing reform package. Chairman RIEGLE and I worked effectively in a bipartisan manner to advance the FIRREA legislation. It is my belief that we can duplicate this effort to respond with similar urgency to the problems in our Nation's housing programs.

The proposal of Secretary Kemp targets those activities of the Department which are in dire need of attention and restructuring. Just last week the GAO testified before the Senate Banking Committee to explain the nature of the $4.2 billion loss of the FHA program in 1988. This loss marks a major turnaround for the program after a decade of financial soundness. Over $960 million of this loss stems from just one program, the coinsurance program.

Although it is clear that the FHA has incurred substantial losses for a variety of reasons, one thing is clear: We have not paid enough attention to managing and monitoring activities that relate to the FHA funds. Secretary Kemp acknowledges the need for focus and reform related to the FHA. Three out of the five areas of the administration's package target FHA. The proposal established a chief financial officer for HUD and a Comptroller to oversee the FHA program. It terminates the title X Land Development Insurance Program, a program which has almost a 50-percent default rate. And, the proposal gets FHA out of the business of insuring vacation homes. These steps and others clearly move in the direction of restoring the integrity and soundness of the FHA program.

In addition to programmatic problems, the Department has been overwhelmed by influence peddling. Whether Republican or Democrat, a consultant with the right ties or connections could benefit from assisting developers with HUD contracts. In some circumstances the consultants have made as much as $300,000 on a single project. Low-income housing programs were not designed to be money-making programs for consultant and lobbyists in Washington. Realistic reform must get HUD out of the business of being a political cash register.

Secretary Kemp's proposal does just this. The proposal requires the registration of consultants, and it ensures that HUD funding used in conjunction with the low-income tax credit is used efficiently and only in situations of need. It eliminates CDBG discretionary funding, a pool of funding which has become prime for special congressional projects which are not truly needed like bike racks and swimming pools.

Secretary Kemp's proposal represents a broad range of concerns about the Department of Housing and Urban Development. It is a proposal that reflects congressional investigations, independent financial audits, and press accounts. It takes into consideration management issues and structural problems with programs. It is a welcome overhaul of an agency that has so desperately needed attention and reform.

These have certainly been trying times at HUD. Not many could have withstood the confusion and pressure. In the face of these problems, Secretary Kemp has exhibited incomparable leadership and resilience. I truly look forward to working with his administration to "clear the decks" and move onward.●

REVISION OF SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL BILL

● Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to point out to my colleagues a revision in the legislation Senator HEINZ and I announced this morning regarding the disposal of solid waste. As my colleagues know, when the Senate convened this morning, Senator HEINZ and I introduced a bill to address the rapidly decreasing landfill capacity in Pennsylvania and throughout the Nation.

The version of the bill we originally planned to introduce, and which I discussed in my floor statement, included a provision to impose a fee, per ton of solid waste, on States currently exporting solid waste to other States. The amount of this fee was to be determined by the Environmental Protection Agency. Revenue raised through the fee would be placed in the U.S. Treasury and would be used to compensate—in part—those States currently accepting out-of-state solid waste.

During the Senate's review of the bill throughout the day, however, tax implications were raised in light of the fee provision which would require extensive review by the Finance Committee, rather than the Committee on Environment and Public Works. Given the urgency of the landfill situation and the need for prompt action to avert an environmental crisis, Senator HEINZ and I decided this evening to revise the bill by omitting the fee provision at this time. We plan to introduce, however, a separate, freestanding bill containing this provision in the near future.

Mr. President, to reiterate my statement expressed this morning, this approach, which focuses on incentives for States to form regional compacts to address solid waste issues, represents a significant beginning to address a difficult problem. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join us in support of this initiative to address landfill problems nationwide.●

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

DAVID COURTLAND O'NEAL, OF ILLINOIS, TO BE AN ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

THE ABOVE NOMINATION WAS APPROVED SUBJECT TO THE NOMINEE'S COMMITMENT TO RESPOND TO REQUESTS TO APPEAR AND TESTIFY BEFORE ANY DULY CONSTITUTED COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Friday, October 13, 1989

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

As we meditate on all the blessings of life, O God, we especially pray for the blessing of peace in our lives and in our world. Our earnest petition and prayer, O gracious God, our fervent hope, is that people will learn to live together in reconciliation and respect so the terrors of war will be no more. As You have created each person, O God, we pray that You would so guide our hearts and minds that every person of every place and background will focus on Your great gift of life, and so learn to live in unity. May Your special blessings be upon the peacemakers of our world and may Your eternal spirit be with us always. In Your name we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KYL] if he would kindly come forward and lead the membership in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. KYL led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS IN YUGOSLAVIA

(Mr. BROOMFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday our committee had a visit by the Prime Minister of Yugoslavia.

It was a revealing performance. I asked him pointblank about human rights violations in his country. Despite the charges by Amnesty International, he denies that a problem exists.

But it was not what he said; it was how he said it. What his eyes said to me is that he is unconcerned about the torture his political opponents are getting.

The Prime Minister wants political unity in Yugoslavia. And it looks to me like he will get it at the expense of the innocent victims who oppose him.

The Prime Minister also wants economic assistance from the United States. But there are a lot of Members who are fed up with regimes who torture their own people with one hand and extend the other hand for humanitarian aid.

Mr. Speaker, let us send him home this time with empty pockets.

INTRODUCTION OF HUD REFORMS LEGISLATION

(Mr. KYL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, last week, HUD Secretary Jack Kemp announced a very positive package of reforms intended to put a stop to the type of fraud and mismanagement that has plagued HUD over the last 20 years, under Democrat and Republican administrations alike. I invite my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join me as an original cosponsor of that reform package when it is introduced.

Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the Employment and Housing Subcommittee of the Government Operations Committee which has been investigating the HUD scandal. The panel is looking into allegations of political favoritism and influence peddling. We have heard allegations that Community Development Block Grant funding has been used to make political contributions to local politicians, as well as to buy cocaine. Any taxpayer would be outraged if presented with such information, we did not implement reforms that ensure it could never happen again.

The Kemp plan does that. Once implemented, it will ensure that funding decisions are made out in the open, not behind closed doors for the benefit of political patrons. It will ensure that projects are funded on the basis of merit, not on the basis of who is advocating them at a particular time. It provides better targeting of funds to serve those who need help most.

I want to commend Secretary Kemp not only for stepping forward with a comprehensive reform package, but also for his leadership and quick action as reports of mismanagement came to light. The Department could not have been led through this troubled time by a more able and capable individual than our former colleague, Jack Kemp.

I hope OMB will expedite its review of the reforms so that this House can take them up as quickly thereafter as possible.

HOW TO GET SERIOUS ABOUT DEFICIT REDUCTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, our colleague DAN ROSTENKOWSKI has a thoughtful and provocative article about our budget problems in today's New York Times.

I think his argument accurately reflects the frustration many of us feel about the budget debate. It is an exercise in evasion that is both misleading and phony. I join the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in saying that its time to get serious about deficit reduction.

I hope his forceful argument will convince others as well.

[From the New York Times, Oct. 13, 1989]

GRAMM-RUDMAN? LET THE AX FALL

(By Dan Rostenkowski)

Now that the House has passed the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989, the deficit reduction bill designed to avoid automatic spending cuts under Gramm-Rudman, I have some advice for the members of the Senate, where the debate has stalled. If you think that the Federal budget deficit should be reduced, the surest way to accomplish that goal is to shelve this legislation and allow the Gramm-Rudman spending cuts to go into effect next Monday.

Every criticism of Gramm-Rudman is true: It is mindless, it represents an abdication of responsibility by the President and the Congress and it sends an awful signal to the markets about our ability to govern.

For all of its faults, however, Gramm-Rudman has one thing going for it—it can result in more real deficit reduction than we will ever achieve from the budget reconciliation bill.

The spending cuts under Gramm-Rudman, distributed across the board between defense and nondefense programs, would reduce the Federal deficit by $16 billion next year and by $80 billion over the next five years. By comparison, the legislation working its way through the Congress will reduce the deficit by only $16 billion over the next five years and will result in growing deficits in 1993 and beyond.

At the beginning of this year, we had a tremendous opportunity to confront the deficit. We had a new President, a new Congress and a growing public awareness of the need to put our fiscal house in order. Instead of grasping the opportunity, we decided on a "slide-by" budget, one that would provide only modest deficit reduction but that would set the stage for a grand compromise next year.

Whatever semblance of budget discipline existed at the beginning of this year's legislative process, however, has all but disappeared in recent weeks. The House, for example, rushed to accommodate budget-busting amendments to this bill. In addition to abandoning fiscal responsibility, the House fully retreated on several important initiatives, like repealing the catastrophic health care program, and started the assault on tax reform by passing a reduction in the capital gains tax.

I have been particularly distressed with the cynicism of President Bush's economic advisers, and his supporters in the Congress, in their approach to the entire debate. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, Richard Darman, has enthusiastically decried "now-nowism": the pursuit of immediate gratification rather than planning for the future. The Secretary of the Treasury, Nicholas Brady, has forcefully endorsed incentives to encourage long-term economic growth.

Yet the Administration has substituted "slide-by" budget plans, blue smoke and mirrors, off-budget financing and short-term revenue "surges" for sound budget discipline. The President's budget advisers have been driven by political concerns, with little, if any, regard for the real consequences of their budgetary actions.

Popularly elected presidents enjoy their greatest power and influence in their first year in office. George Bush is no exception. Yet he is squandering his influence to pursue a tax cut for the wealthiest 5 percent of our population in a year when our deficit exceeds $130 billion and study after study shows the gap between rich and poor widening. What kind of priorities does that represent?

Our refusal to attack the deficit would be comic if it were not so irresponsible. We want the Federal Government to step up the war on drugs, but we are unwilling to pay for it. We can't walk down the street without stepping over living, breathing examples of homelessness. We can't keep up with the bills for a cleaner environment. We hide the bills for the savings and loan bail-out off-budget. We have 37 million Americans without health insurance and a child poverty rate that is a disgrace.

In a year when we should have been engaged in a serious debate about the national priorities, the deficit provided a wonderful fog to obscure the hard decisions that should have been made.

It's the sad truth that we have a President who refuses to lead and a Congress that is institutionally incapable of leading the deficit reduction effort. This has left budget watchers wondering what crisis will force the President, the Congress and even the public to finally confront the deficit.

The answer is Gramm-Rudman. Let the cuts go into effect next Monday. Make them permanent and make them hurt. And when the budget process begins next year, maybe all of us, starting with the President, will be ready to meet our collective responsibilities to govern.

UPDATE ON ACTIVITIES OF THE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to use but a fraction of the allotted time granted, and the reason for that is to continue and complete the report that I gave last Friday with respect to the conduct and the progress of the business undertaken by the House of Representatives' Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

I might say in view of the 1-minute special order a few minutes ago with respect to the reform package of Secretary Kemp that also as chairman of the Subcommittee of the Banking Committee on Housing and Community Development, that there is quite a bit of confusion, and I guess it is understandable to the external world that finds it difficult to understand our procedural methods and environment that the Government Operations Subcommittee that has been conducting the hearings has been doing so on the basis of the report that the inspector general of HUD gave us earlier this year, the first report in obedience to the letter that I had directed to that same inspector general a year ago on June 9, to be precise.

The Government Operations Subcommittee is a housekeeping subcommittee and not a legislative committee. The subcommittee of substance that has jurisdiction on the legislative aspects is the Subcommittee on Housing and Community Development.

Just last week I received the second inspector general's report in obedience to the second letter that I addressed to him on June 24 last year. It has taken that long to get the report, and it has to do with what we called the section 8 existing housing programs, the first report, and which has scandalized the Nation as a result of the hearings of the Government Operations Subcommittee, which had to do with the so-called section 8 moderate rehabilitation program.

I want to disabuse any of my colleagues' minds or any citizens' minds about what these abuses have been about. Just the predecessor colleague who spoke out in the 1-minute referred to scandals in both Republican as well as Democratic administrations, and I think that is unfair. There is nothing in this history of the administration of these programs from FHA to the recent enactment, and I say recent, 1978, the moderate rehab programs, to indicate that any prior administration to the Reagan Republican administration had such things as collusion between HUD officials and developers and speculators at any time in the history of those programs. It just simply had not happened until we had the maladministration, the corrupt administration of Reagan's HUD.

As chairman of the subcommittee, I had been since 1981 pointing out what turned out to be these revelations now. I think the record should be clear so there will not be any sliding off.

□ 1010

Of course, we commend Secretary Kemp. We have given him full support. We were the first to ask him to appear before the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs soon after he was confirmed.

As a matter of fact, I was the only Congressman present at his swearing in. So, of course, we are in consolance with what he is seeking.

Again, let me disabuse any misconception that my colleagues might have. Eighty percent of the reforms that Secretary Kemp is asking for are not in the legislative or the policy or the programmatic side of things; they are in the administrative side of things, ethics, the conduct and issuance and promulgation of rules to govern the administration of programs. That is something we cannot legislate on.

There is no way we can pass a law to make any hired hand in the administrative branch honest or efficient, which has been true since the beginning of our form of government.

The President under the Constitution is charged with faithfully executing the laws. That means laws and policies. If the President does not faithfully do so, the only thing available is impeachment.

I want to remind my colleagues that I was the only one to introduce an impeachment resolution on Mr. Reagan on March 5, 1987.

So I think we should keep the record straight here so we do not again make the mistake that in merely creating an image that something is being done, we really do not address the fundamental issues.

I would like to return to the source of the comments I wish to make in the continuation of the report.

I promised my colleagues when I was elected chairman of the House Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs that I would report faithfully as we progressed into the year, a very fateful year.

We came aboard at a time when we had finally averted what we had seen and had spoken about from the wells here, but which, unfortunately, as in the case of HUD, we could not muster any kind of public attention.

I do not know what we can do about that. We do not write the newspapers. We do not determine what is newsworthy of reporting. That has been left to our free and independent press, as it should be, and I am all for it.

But be that as it may, I have always thought since I came to Congress that it did not make sense for us to compartmentalize ourselves in our individual committees.

President Woodrow Wilson in his epical book on the Congress said that we were a conjury of disconnected or disaggregated little fiefdoms, meaning that in every committee and subcommittee you inherently had a small version of the House of Representatives.

That is true. So many of our citizens, when they witness the business here, fail to see Members present and feel that Members are not attentive.

That is untrue. Even during discussion of some bills on business pending on the House floor, in the absence of a recorded vote, relatively few Members are present.

But that does not mean the Members are absent. They are watching either on our in-house television the proceedings on the House floor, or they are busily attending to the business of the subcommittees and committees, most of which will be having hearings and shaping and molding the legislation that will be on the calendar for discussion by the full House.

But I have never felt that we should compartmentalize ourselves where we do not communicate among ourselves. I did not think that the responsibility of the chairmanship of a committee ended by conducting its business, setting the agenda, and then when and if legislation was produced and cleared by the Rules Committee, it would be handled on the House floor. I felt we had to communicate.

Sometimes we have placed with the best of intentions almost impossible burdens on administators. I know I have seen over the course of seven presidencies administrators come on the same issue to seven different committee and subcommittee hearings just on the House side, not counting the Senate side. So I feel we have to have some intercommunication.

I pledged on January 4, the day after we convened for the 101st Congress, that as a newly-elected chairman of the Banking Committee I would be reporting, and I did so last week.

I said among other things that one reason I have stayed on the Banking Committee is that it has always been my field of interest. When I was in the State Senate of Texas I was privileged to have served as a chairman of the Senate's Committee on Banking.

When I was a member of the city council of the city of San Antonio, my own specialty was understanding and interpreting the finances of the municipality. It was tremendously helpful.

I was very much privileged to have been referred as a member to the Banking Committee when I first came to Congress 28 years ago. I have tried to serve under my oath faithfully and well my duties as a member of the Banking Committee for those 28 years.

I feel that behind every single activity you have financing or banking, and in all the history of mankind, of governments, particularly ours, this is particularly true.

I said among other things last Friday that behind almost every event, whether it is war or any international event during peacetime, there is a financial question. I said that, and I repeat it now, that it is possible to win a war in the field and lose it at the finance tables. And we have done that.

World War I and its aftermath is being repeated after World War II. The scene is different, the names of the countries involved are different, but the basic things are not different that are exerting forces.

I pointed out last week that the situation with respect to the American financial and banking system is quite critical. There are many reasons for it.

We have a unique system. We have a dual system of State banking and national banking. No other country that I know of, particularly in the industrialized world, has anything like it.

With the world as it is today, not as it was after World War II, everything has changed. I believe that we in the Congress have not kept pace with change.

This is something that any student of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show I have been saying for no less than 26 years. However, time and events are catching up on us. I believe we have reached the point of no return with respect to the enforcement of some of the laws that in anticipation we had a hand in shaping.

I reported last Friday on one of several pieces of legislation, and that was the legislation that was passed in order to report international flow of cash and domestic cash transactions of large amounts by our national banks particularly, but also by all of the insured banks under the Federal depository insurance laws as well, resulted from a hearing that I initiated.

I was able to persuade the subcommittee at that time to come to my hometown of San Antonio in 1976 to conduct hearings and to pass subsequent legislation, including the 1978 International Banking or Finance Act. That act provided for the neutrality or reciprocity in banking penetrations, if you want to call it that, among the industrialized nations.

I repeat, at the bottom of everything is banking and finance. It has been true all along and it is true now, more than ever.

I reported last week that for instance things such as the war against drugs, it is a misnomer. I told my colleagues that you can spend all of the wealth, all of the substance of this country, you can appropriate all the moneys available, and you are not going to win the war on drugs until you plug the hole of those that are reaping financial benefit from the illicit drug trade.

□ 1020

And that is many billions of dollars. And it involves banking institutions, it involves highly placed members of our society. And until that is addressed, everything will be in vain, I tell my colleagues.

So I intend to have some amendments that will bring up to date the transactions that I think are at the heart of controlling, if ever we do, this situation. It is like king crime, in 1978 and 1979, I had so many special orders I was criticized on the then judicial system, of Federal Judge John W. Wood. That was going to be forgotten like the murder of Jimmy Hoffa.

But we kept attention on it. And I am proud to say that the Director of the FBI called me to give me credit for having kept that alive and enable them to have the first five indictments 2 years after I started those special orders.

But behind all of that was financing. It was the tie-in between the stolen vehicles going into Mexico, for instance, and coming back by way of illicit drugs. I pointed out how certain car models had certain values in pounds of marijuana or kilos of marijuana or cocaine or, at that time, heroin.

So that the end result was that I said: However, the criminal element, king crime, is so highly organized, so penetrative of our society that it is impossible now to remove those tentacles. Until we separate the involvement of the political, the business and the highly placed people of power, we will have no control over king crime.

Part of that now is the outgrowth in this tremendous thing we call the illicit drug trade. But that is beside the point. On this occasion I want to give and ask consent that I present at this time for the RECORD a chart of the financial institutions, the leading world banks, because that reveals that just within the last 5 years the 12 principal banks are Japanese today. Our No. 1 bank 10 years ago is today No. 13 or 15, who knows by now?

The thing that arouses me and concerns me greatly is the greed, the percentage of penetration now. I referred to the direct acquisition of assets by foreign venture capital during the Reagan administration. It was during Reagan's administration that we became a debtor nation for the first time since 1914. When President Roosevelt wanted to build the canal in Panama, we had to go to the French capitalists and borrow $40 million in that day and time to build it with.

We were not a creditor nation. By 1914 we were, and we were the only creditor nation in two world wars.

We are no longer that. We are now the biggest debtor nation.

I pointed it out last Friday that both governmental debt structure, both on budget and off budget, what the Europeans call contingency debt, has grown to undue proportions, $2 trillion. That is impossible to imagine.

But the private debt of our citizenry is the greatest of all. The private corporate debt structure of the corporations of our country is astronomical. It is really unhealthy.

Now the day of reckoning is inevitable, but here we are now, not a creditor nation, a debtor nation. It was our debt that enabled the allies to win two world wars, nothing else, our credit. Without our credit, the allies would have lost World War I within less than a year and World War II within less than a year.

But now we are a debtor nation. All of this happened just within the last 6 years.

The fantasy and delusion, I call it a giant national Jonestown that we have been living on, where the delusion was that we had prosperity, all of it on borrowed money, fickle investment money that can pull out overnight.

Now when it did in the case of Chicago's Continental Illinois, the bank collapsed. It was nothing else that triggered it off.

Of course, there were underlying factors, but the immediate factor was a pullout of those foreign money and deposits in that bank overnight.

And this is where we have reached this stage now.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to offer this chart to show the status and ratings of the banks. But more importantly, the most ominous thing, and I think now we are getting some attention: We have reached a point where the penetration, which is both heavy on the part of Japanese as well as European, mostly Great Britain, into our banking institutions. That has now reached what I consider to be an unacceptable percentage. It is a little better than 21 percent today.

The big announcement about the No. 1 Japanese bank having moved into our banking system and the acquisition of the investment side of Manufacturers Hanover Trust in New York, but before that and still continuing on an unaddressed question is the hostile takeover of banks.

The regulator, Federal Reserve Board, failed to make any kind of judgmental evaluation when we had the first attempt involving the Bank of New York in which, in order to save itself, it was calling on the Bank of Italy to come in with the infusion of capital.

Fortunately, or maybe unfortunately, with the withdrawal of that threat, an amicable merger or agreement was reached. But the question still remains: What will we do about this very unhealthy takeover, merger-type of approach in the case of the banks?

The regulators have not, the Congress must establish some policy.

So in the case of the penetration of the foreign financial banking interests in the takeover or penetration of our depository financial institutions known as our banking system of the United States, I think it is too unhealthy for it to have been allowed to reach 21 percent-plus. That is dangerous to the national interest and to the safety and soundness of the American banking system.

I would ask leave at this point that I may place in the RECORD a chart showing the extent of this penetration of our banking system.

The chart referred to follows:

I think it will reveal to my colleagues when you see the record the need for us to do something. So in pursuance of that, I have just addressed a letter to the distinguished chairman of our Subcommittee on Financial Institutions, Supervision, Regulation and Insurance, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], who is also the ranking member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, specifically requesting that his subcommittee, which has the proper jurisdiction of this subject matter, initiate immediately a review of the International Banking Act of 1978, in which we think we have the fundamental predicate for legislation. Why have not our administrators or regulators followed through on the plain congressional intent of that 1978 act and allowed, without advising Congress of any alarm or caution, this degree of penetration and particularly the tremendous amount and volume of the Japanese banks which, as I say and repeat, are now the chief and biggest and leading banking institutions of the world?

The letter referred to follows:

COMMITTEE ON BANKING,
FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, October 13, 1989.

Hon. FRANK ANNUNZIO,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Financial Institutions, Supervision, Regulation and Insurance, Washington, DC.

DEAR FRANK: The International Banking Act of 1978 established a federal regulatory framework, based on the principle of national treatment, governing the entry and operations of foreign banks in the United States. National treatment accords foreign banks equality of competitive opportunity with domestic institutions in similar circumstances, even if some specific regulations or requirements applied to foreign banks differ from those affecting domestic banks. While national treatment has served to facilitate the rapid expansion of foreign owned and controlled banks in the United States, I am concerned that U.S. financial institutions have not been, in practice, accorded equality of competitive opportunity abroad.

At present, it is estimated that foreign banks operating in the U.S. have captured 21% of the domestic banking market, while U.S. banks are swiftly retreating from markets in Europe, Japan, Hong Kong, and Latin America. I am concerned that this trend may be the result of our domestic authorities not being as sensitive in enforcing the national treatment policy as have been several of our foreign competitors. Accordingly, I respectfully request your Subcommittee undertake a study of the national treatment policy to determine if this policy is effective in providing U.S. financial institutions with true equality of competitive opportunity abroad, and if not, what changes need to be made to have this goal realized.

Such a study should include an analysis of whether laws and regulations related to foreign bank operations and activities in the U.S. are being effectively enforced, whether U.S. laws and regulations governing a foreign bank's U.S. operations are similar to those employed by competitor nations and whether or not there is a need to modify these controls to ensure that U.S. banks are not operating at a disadvantage domestically or abroad vis-a-vis foreign banks.

It would also be helpful if this study included an analysis of the mechanisms foreign countries use to control foreign investment. For example, Canada utilizes an oversight board to review foreign investments. Would it be favorable for the U.S. to employ such a mechanism?

In addition, it would be helpful to have a better understanding of the impact that foreign banks have on the domestic banking market. It is imperative that we have clear and complete information on the number and financial position of foreign owned and controlled banks operating in the United States, and whether or not reporting requirements for foreign banks are adequate and being properly enforced. It is also important to understand how the presence of foreign banks affects the profitability of domestic banks as well as how such presence affects the availability of credit to domestic corporations and individuals.

The growth of foreign banks in the U.S. has important implications for both our domestic financial system as well as the future availability of credit for U.S. corporations and individuals. It also is imperative that the U.S. financial institutions receive "equality of competitive opportunity" when competing abroad. I commend you for holding hearings aimed at studying the impact of Europe 1992 on U.S. financial institutions. I respectfully request your Subcommittee undertake this study so that we may fully understand the implications of the trend towards greater foreign presence in the U.S. banking system, coupled with a shrinking U.S. presence in the international banking arena.

Thank you for your consideration of this request. I look forward to working with you on this most critical and sensitive issue.

With best wishes.

Sincerely,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Chairman.

□ 1020

Now behind all of this, we must never forget that where we might have been very nonchalant and complacent, both in the case of Europe as well as the case of Japan, I have spoken out since 1964 on our need to revise, in light of the developments in Europe, the reality of the new world is that we have generations today right on the threshold of power in all of these countries that do not remember World War II. We must never forget what I have said repeatedly that the German leader, Chancellor Kohl, and the Russian leader, Mr. Gorbachev, were both 15 years of age at the time of World War II.

Now all of that has changed. However, the United States, we have 300,000 plus of our military in Germany alone, not counting the families and the relatives there.

Now, that world has changed. However, we are budgeting and we are spending 60 to 65 percent of our defense budget, so-called defense budget, which I think today would be no less than $315 billion, for what is nominally understood that is the defense of Europe. But what Europe?

Our mindsets, at least the Presidential mindsets up to now, and congressional mindsets, have been a Europe of 1947. Well, that is gone forever.

As I said last week, we may have changed the designation of our troops from occupation to defense, but we are occupied, and when we ask how many troops do the French have and where, how many troops do the British have and where, then it becomes very interesting. At a time when Europe is integrating, it has developed now a currency unit and a monetary system that I cannot help but believe is a potential for displacing the dollar as the international reserve unit. I pointed out to my colleagues last Friday that to contemplate even that possibility is awesome, because if the dollar is replaced as the international reserve unit, and I want to assure my colleagues that that danger I have been pointing out since 1979 is very grave and present and clear, and it would be catastrophic to think of the consequences, because all of that debt that we piled up would have to be paid back in somebody else's currency, not our dollars. So I persist in speaking out, but it would be helpful if I had some help.

I am instructing and suggesting to our distinguished chairman of the subcommittee that he undertake, as soon as possible on the part of the subcommittee, which is one of the largest subcommittees in the whole Congress, to review immediately and see what we can do about implementing that 1978 act. We do have reciprocal agreements, but if we do not enforce ours, and the Japanese do theirs, and the Europeans do theirs, then we have, I think, a very unwholesome and a rather dangerous situation for the United States financial and, therefore, economic system.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

I AM NOT YOUR BOY

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 13, 1989

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, on October 7 I took part in a forum under the banner of "Public Policy Implications of Contemporary Homosexuality." I shared the podium that day with William Allen, Chairman of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission.

Chairman Allen chose as his topic "Blacks? Animals? Homosexuals?: What is a Minority?" For just the announcement of the subject matter, Chairman Allen was vilified by the homosexual movement and its activist cattle prods on the political left. How dare Bill Allen compare homosexuals to animals. How dare Bill Allen deny the equality to sodomy in the same manner he affirms the rights of blacks. How dare Bill Allen participate in a conference that would even suggest that homosexuality is a behavioral pathology.

Mr. Speaker, the voices which attacked Chairman Allen prior to his even uttering a single word at the conference are evidence of the fascist-like activities of the militant homosexual movement whenever anyone is found in disagreement with them. Oh, how liberal and open-minded these smug people are until they encounter a differing opinion.

Chairman Allen released a letter to the public he wrote to the gentleman from California, Mr. EDWARDS. I commend the letter and the following editorial from my district.

U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS,
Washington, DC, October 9, 1989.

Hon. DON EDWARDS,
Member, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE EDWARDS: I enclose to you the copy of the speech I delivered on 7 October at a seminar on "Public Policy Implications of Contemporary Homosexuality," and about which you expressed considerable apprehension in the days immediately preceding. You will find upon reading it, I trust, that your apprehensions were entirely unfounded.

This is the second time in a very few months that you have employed veiled threats to try to determine my mind. You either have not read or have not understood my previous response. I wish to be clear: I am not your "boy."

Rather than to presume upon my conduct or understandings, and thence to command me, you have the right and the means to inquire honestly. I will even seek to explain what you do not know. All else is illegitimate and mere usurpation.

In all candor, however, I do not expect so gracious a change in your conduct at this late hour. It becomes increasingly apparent that your readiness to jump to conclusions, and to spark public outcry without evidence or foundation, stems rather from an inveterate spirit of hostility—a predisposed opposition. That in turn probably signals a change only for the worse, rather than the better. Failing as you have to spark serious doubts about my utilities, I imagine you will next revert to what has become by now a ritual in Washington politics—namely to seek to impugn my character or to question my honesty, to criminalize the policy differences at the root of it all.

If it must be so, then let it be. Go right ahead and seek revenge where you cannot compel compliance. I fear not. For I know this: no matter what you do to me, there is a justice, and you will one day feel it.

Most sincerely,

WILLIAM B. ALLEN,
Chairman.

[From the Orange County Register, Oct. 10, 1989]

AN UNCIVIL WRONG

Why wait to read a speech before passing judgment on it? That seems to be the philosophy of most of the members of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. On Friday, six of the panel's eight members issued a vitriolic press release blasting their chairman, California political scientist William Allen, for his intention to address an Orange County seminar on homosexuality sponsored by a conservative group dedicated to "traditional values." The commissioners focused particular bile on the announced title of the remarks: "Blacks? Animals? Homosexuals? What is a Minority?" They decried it as "thoughtless, disgusting, and unnecessarily inflammatory."

But the real thoughtlessness was displayed by these civil rights worthies themselves, who tried to censor Mr. Allen without knowing what he was going to say. After hearing his remarks on Saturday, one might have been left wondering what all the ruckus was about. Imagine a drama critic panning a play he didn't attend. That's the kind of irresponsibility the commissioner's exhibited.

As it happens, the speech was mild to tone and judicious in substance. It was anything but an exercise in homosexual-baiting. Rather, it was a somewhat professorial exploration of the broad concept of human rights and the narrower issue of how—or whether—the idea of "homosexual rights" fits within that philosophical framework.

Mr. Allen's argument is complex but worth trying to simplify and summarize. In essence, he says human rights arise from the common characteristics that unite all men and women and distinguish men and women from animals. He warns that if we divide the human family into arbitrary groups and grant special rights based on membership in those groups, we risk losing sight of our common human nature, that sense in which "all men are created equal," as the Declaration of Independence put it. Such arbitrary divisions carry with them the implication that the favored groups are more equal than others—and blur the distinction between the human and the subhuman that is the ground of all human rights.

Building on that premise, Mr. Allen cautions against granting special homosexual rights, just as he has argued before against special protected status for other minority groups. He urges homosexuals rather to seek to vindicate their rights as individuals not as members of a special group.

That argument is challenging and merits discussion, not knee-jerk denunciation.

What about the title? It was meant to provoke interest, no question. But what's wrong with that? Every popular author or doctoral candidate or television producer worth his or her salt tries for the same effect.

Then there's the question of whether Mr. Allen should have addressed this particular symposium, one sponsored by people who consider homosexuality harmful and sinful. But why shouldn't he have spoken there? He says he is willing to talk about civil rights to any group that asks him. Everybody who believes in the open exchange of ideas should say more power to him.

BECOMING A PART OF THE AMERICAN DREAM

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 13, 1989

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, as is so often the case, events beyond the control of our Government are dictating United States policy. And in the case of immigration, recent events in the Soviet Union have refocused our attention on an area which has been contentious and divisive since the earliest days of our republic.

After decades of steady pressure from presidents and congresses of both parties, synagogues and churches, religious and human rights organizations, foreign governments and thousands of ordinary citizens, the Soviet Union is finally beginning to allow Jews and Pentecostal Christians to emigrate.

As a refugee from tyranny, I know first hand what America means as a haven from persecution, whether religious, economic, or political in nature. And we must all realize that continued, controlled immigration is not only part of the core of our shared values, but also good for us as a Nation. Immigrants from every corner of the globe have immeasurably enriched us as a Nation, and our boundless wealth means that those of us who came earlier have a responsibility to those who now hope to join us.

While the Soviet Union has seen a liberalization and a decrease in official anti-Semitism, Soviet Jews are still a persecuted minority. Indeed, while official, state sponsored anti-Semitism is on the decline, some observers have noted a reawakening of anti-Semitism in the public at large, sadly linked with the rebirth of nationalism among the Soviet peoples. And while we all fervently hope that reform and liberalization will continue, we must be prepared for the possibility that a backlash can occur, with all the devastating human consequences that may entail. Soviet history is too full of twists and turns for us to assume that any liberalization, however broad and however needed, will continue indefinitely.

The United States clearly has a moral responsibility to accept these refugees. After years of pressure, Mr. Gorbachev has finally had the courage to meet our challenge. And given the possibility of a crackdown at any time, the case of the Soviet Jews is a special case.

But over the long term, Congress and the Administration need to overhaul our Nation's immigration policy. Our present policy is confusing, inadequate, and at times, contradictory.

Mr. Gorbachev's Soviet Union has finally begun to live up to some of the norms of the civilized world. By letting the Soviet Jews emigrate, he has taken a dramatic, overdue, and welcome step. We as a society must be prepared to accept these refugees, offer them haven, and allow them to join us in becoming part of the American dream.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS SHOULD BE OPEN TO ALL NEWS MEDIA—HOUSE RESOLUTION 253 WILL INSURE SUNSHINE FOR CONGRESSIONAL ACTIVITIES

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 13, 1989

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, last week I introduced House Resolution 253 to amend the Rules of the House of Representatives to permit our committees to allow live media coverage by radio and television of the testimony of a witness appearing under subpoena.

House rule XI 3(f)(2) currently provides that "No witness served with a subpoena by the committee shall be required against his or her will to be photographed at any hearing or to give evidence or testimony while the broadcasting of that hearing by radio or television is being conducted." At "the request of any such witness who does not wish to be subjected to radio, television, or still photograph coverage, all lenses shall be covered and all microphones used for coverage turned off."

Recent developments involving the investigation of waste, fraud, and abuse at the Department of Housing and Urban Development by my Subcommittee on Employment and Housing of the Government Operations Committee have convinced me that this rule should be changed in order to assure the right of the American people to know the activities of their Government. I am also convinced that unless this rule is changed, the ability of House committees to conduct serious oversight investigations will be increasingly difficult.

Two weeks ago, in a highly unusual move, two of the witnesses before our subcommittee invoked this right. Former HUD Secretary Samuel Pierce and his former Executive Assistant Lance Wilson invoked this rule to prevent television and radio coverage of their appearance before the subcommittee.

Since the adoption of this House rule in 1970, this right has been invoked only on three previous occasions: First, in 1978 by Marina Oswald Porter, the widow of Lee Harvey Oswald, in her testimony before the Select Committee on Assassinations; second, by Ralph and Joseph Bernstein and Barry Knox in 1984 before the House Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs during the investigation of corruption and embezzlement by Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos of the Philippines; and third, by Michael Milken in his appearance in 1988 before the Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations of the Energy and Commerce Committee securities irregularities.

Although this rule has been used infrequently, there is a very disturbing trend. The rule has been in existence now for 19 years, but six of the seven individuals who have invoked it have done so in the last 4 years.

Mr. Speaker, the voluntary cooperation of witnesses with House committees is important to the success of our oversight investigations. With this increasing use of the right to prohibit television and radio coverage of committee hearings, witnesses now have an incentive not to appear voluntarily. If they refuse to cooperate and the committee must subpoena their appearance, they then have the right to limit media coverage. Unless this rule is modified, Mr. Speaker, I see the real likelihood that conducting oversight hearings will be increasingly difficult in the future.

House Resolution 253, which I introduced, modifies the right of subpoenaed witnesses to prohibit television, radio, and still photographic coverage of congressional hearings. House rule XI (3)(f)(2) as amended by this resolution would allow witnesses to prohibit television and radio coverage of their appearance before a House committee "unless a majority of the members of the committee voting, a quorum being present, vote otherwise." This important change in House rules gives our committees the opportunity to consider and then vote upon witnesses' efforts to close hearings to television, radio, and still photography.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to understand the background of House rule XI(3)(f)(2). It was adopted by the House in 1970 as part of the Legislative Reorganization Act of that year. This rule has no connection with the series of rule changes adopted by the House in 1955 to protect witnesses in the aftermath of the McCarthy era.

At the very same time that the House adopted this rule, however, the Senate approved a very different procedure. Senate rules permit each individual committee to make its own rules regarding television cameras and microphones. There is no general rule in the Senate allowing witnesses, even those appearing under subpoena, to restrict media coverage of committee hearings. While rules of the Senate do not establish a precedent for this body, they are indicative of the current trends that clearly favor greater openness in the proceedings of the Congress.

There is well-established precedent for taking the approach envisioned in my legislation to change this House rule.

For over a decade now, the House of Representatives has permitted full gavel to gavel coverage by television and radio of its proceedings. The only exception to this policy of complete openness are the extremely rare instances when classified materials are discussed by the entire House. For over 2 years, the other body—the Senate—has permitted full television and radio coverage of its proceedings. To deny full media access to our committee proceedings is a reversal of this trend toward greater openness in Congress.

The House earlier voted to permit one of its select committees to allow full media coverage of the testimony of subpoenaed witnesses, despite House rule XI(3)(f)(2). Paragraph (4) of House Resolution 12 of the 100th Congress—the legislation establishing the House "Select Committee To Investigate Covert Arms Transactions with Iran," the so-called Iran-Contra Committee—specifically authorized the select committee by a majority vote of a quorum of the committee to open its hearings to full media coverage.

Mr. Speaker, the time has come for us to change a House rule, which no longer serves the best interest of the American people and which does not serve the best interest of witnesses who appear before our committees. In an era when the vast majority of the American people rely on the electronic media for news, it is essential to permit full media access to the workings of congressional committees.

It is most unlikely that this proposed rule change will have any impact upon our investigation of HUD, but I feel very strongly that this change must be made. The American people have the right to know through the media of television and radio what is happening in their Congress, and unless this change is made, our task of conducting the people's business will be much more difficult.

I urge my colleagues in the Congress to join me in supporting this change of House rules. It is time to change an outdated rule which allows one person to keep congressional hearings closed from public view. The American people are served by greater openness—not by limitations on media coverage of our activities.

ROCHESTER FOUNDATION FOR PERSONS WITH BRAIN/HEAD INJURY

HON. LOUISE M. SLAUGHTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 13, 1989

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, we need affordable programs to help brain- and head-injured persons to reestablish themselves after their post-trauma rehabilitation. These injuries affect over 700,000 people each year in the United States. The causes are many, including motor vehicle accidents, sports injuries, and strokes. New medical procedures are increasing the numbers of survivors, and our country continues to make progress in the areas of inpatient and outpatient rehabilitation. But affordable, long-term programs are virtually nonexistent.

These people, who are often quite young, usually have only two options—lifelong dependency on family members or confinement to institutions that are inappropriate for their needs. Research data from across the country indicates that the most pressing needs, for brain- and head-injured individuals, are vocational and recreational opportunities. They need to regain or learn to compensate for the loss of their abilities; they need activities to help avoid the social isolation which frequently accompanies brain or head injury; and they need to be able to use their time constructively.

I am proud to note that, within the 30th Congressional District of New York, a not-for-profit organization has very recently been formed to address these needs. The Rochester Foundation For Persons With Brain/Head Injury is an innovative, all-volunteer group whose purpose it is to provide financial and human resources for the creation of a nonresidential, community-based vocational training and recreational center. This center will be organized and operated by brain- and head-injured individuals along with a support staff. They will offer varied social and vocational activities to assist the participant to function more independently at home and in the community.

Organizations such as the Rochester Foundation For Persons With Brain/Head Injury are the first step toward fulfilling the unmet needs of the brain and head injured. I admire and congratulate its founders, President Joan Swarthout and Chairman Janice Avery, for their tireless and selfless dedication to this cause. I wish them every success, and I urge my colleagues to join me in encouraging and supporting similar efforts in their home districts.

A TRIBUTE TO UPLAND POLICE CHIEF COY D. ESTES

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

Friday, October 13, 1989

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention today a man who has committed all of his professional life to the highest level of community service, the chief of police in Upland, CA, Coy D. Estes. Chief Estes is retiring on November 1 after a distinguished 27-year career with the Upland Police Department.

Chief Estes' career began in 1962 as a reserve officer for the Upland Police Department. Over the years, he was consistently promoted to higher ranks—regular officer, sergeant, lieutenant, captain—and was appointed chief of police in April 1976. Remarkably, Chief Estes had the opportunity to serve in every rank within the police department.

During his tenure with the Upland Police Department, Chief Estes initiated many new and innovative programs to serve the local community. Dozens of community programs with on-going emphasis on police and community relations and crime prevention have been established under his stewardship. His devotion to drug education among students led to the implementation of the DARE [drug abuse resistance education] program for the local school system. And, most notably, these contributions to the community, and others, have been made while maintaining one of the lowest crime rates in the county.

Chief Estes' community involvement goes beyond his commitment to law enforcement. He is a past board member of the Upland Boys Club, a past president of the Upland Foothill Kiwanis Club, a past president and board member of the West End YMCA, a member of the Ontario Masonic Lodge and a board member of the Upland Traffic Safety Advisory Committee. Chief Estes is also a member of the California Police Chiefs Association and the California Peace Officers Association. In the past, he has been recognized for his many contributions including an award from the Foothill PTA Council for his work with youth in the field of drug education and awareness, and recognition from Kiwanis for outstanding community services in the field of youth drug education.

A lifelong resident of the Upland area, Chief Estes has also been blessed with a fine and loving family, sharing his life for the past 32 years with his wife Shirley, and having two children, Clay and Karen.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to recognize the many fine achievements and contributions of Chief Coy Estes as he begins a most well-deserved retirement. I join all of my friends in Upland and the surrounding area in wishing him good health and God's speed.

A SALUTE TO CENTRAL KENTUCKY FIRE FIGHTERS

HON. LARRY J. HOPKINS

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 13, 1989

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in honor of the outstanding work of our firefighters in central Kentucky. This past weekend I had the distinct honor of speaking to the participants of the central Kentucky Firefighters Association's training workshop. Their hard work, dedication and self-sacrifice is exemplary of the outstanding work of all firefighters throughout the bluegrass area.

For many, many years, I have admired the dedication and courage of our firefighters who are engaged in some of the most dangerous work conceivable. Eighty-five percent of the 3 million men and women who comprise the fire services are volunteer. Every day they risk their lives to protect the lives, health, and property of others for little, if any compensation.

In honor of their commitment, I joined the congressional fire services caucus which was formed to provide a nationally coordinated effort to promote the interests of the fire services and the needs of our firefighters.

I am a proud cosponsor of legislation to designate Saturday, October 14 as "National Firefighters Day."

I am also a cosponsor of the fire service bill of rights, a monumental initiative that will better protect and promote America's fire service. Among its many provisions, the bill will create a system of grants to permit every local fire department to acquire hazardous material response equipment. It will improve access to surplus Federal property and establish a fire department loan fund to help fire departments obtain state-of-the-art equipment. To protect the spouses and children of fallen firefighters, the bill establishes a scholarship fund to provide for their college education. It provides funding support to permit worthy students to pursue graduate degrees in fire safety engineering. It will return control of the National Fire Academy to the U.S. Fire Administration and will create a National Fire Center and Museum in Washington, DC, to celebrate the contributions and achievements of our firefighters over the past 200 years. The bill will also provide assistance in developing new technologies on how we can better treat burn victims.

All of these important initiatives will not cost the American taxpayers a cent because the bill authorizes the U.S. Mint to sell a commemorative coin honoring the 200th anniversary of the death of Ben Franklin, the father of the American fire service.

I am also pleased to announce that I am an original cosponsor of legislation that will soon be introduced which will provide $2 million of Federal funding for Kentucky firefighters. One million dollars will pay for new equipment for volunteer fire departments. Another million dollars will go to the Forest Service to provide training for volunteer firefighters across the Commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, as we celebrate National Fire Prevention Week, it is truly fitting to pay tribute to our unsung heroes in the fire service and commend them for their contributions to our continued health, safety, and progress.

FLORIDA INTERNATIONAL UNIVERSITY RANKS HIGH IN ITS CLASS

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

Friday, October 13, 1989

Mrs. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the outstanding academic achievement of my alma mater, Florida International University in Miami, FL. For the second year in a row, U.S. News & World Report's annual ranking of universities and colleges has singled out FIU, from 200 universities, for its quality in education.

This year FIU has placed sixth among the top 15 Southern universities in the category of schools where few doctorates are awarded and more than half of the bachelor's degrees are awarded in professional fields.

Of the ranking, Dr. Modesto "Mitch" Maidique, president of FIU said: "It is a serious attempt to establish a measurement of quality."

Mr. Speaker, I would like all my colleagues to join me in congratulating Dr. Mitch Maidique and the fine staff of Florida International University for their commitment to education.

H.R. 3469, THE FEDERAL AGENCY DEBT MANAGEMENT ACT

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, October 13, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation, along with Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI, and Congressmen PICKLE, GIBBONS, RUSSO, JENKINS, DOWNEY, GRADISON, PANETTA, and SLATTERY which amends chapter 31 of the United States Code, dealing with the Government's borrowing authority and the public debt. This legislation curbs certain unauthorized borrowings by newly established agencies or instrumentalities of the Federal Government which have the authority to borrow from the Treasury.

For this purpose, such entities would be permitted to borrow only from the Treasury, and would not be permitted to issue any obligations or otherwise borrow any amount, guarantee any obligation or incur any direct or contingent liability to pay any amount in respect of an obligation. The legislation is applicable to agencies or instrumentalities established under any law enacted after December 31, 1988.

I wish to emphasize that this bill would only affect agencies or instrumentalities established after December 31, 1988, and which have an ability to borrow directly from the Treasury, meaning that the full faith and credit of the U.S. Government backs the principle and interest of those borrowings. It would not affect such agencies as the FDIC, Sallie Mae and Fannie Mae, or any other long-established Government agency.

It also would not affect any agency whether off or on budget that does not have the authority under law, to borrow directly from the Treasury. The primary purpose of the legislation is to protect the public debt from unauthorized increases.

The Oversight Subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means will conduct hearings on H.R. 3469 on Tuesday, October 24, 1989.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I introduced today is effective for direct or contingent obligations incurred, issued, or guaranteed on or after December 1, 1989. I have chosen the December 1 date to allow the administration, the Treasury Department, the General Accounting Office, the Congressional Budget Office, and other interested parties the opportunity to make technical comments to the draft legislation at the Oversight Subcommittee hearing on October 24. I wish to put the administration on notice, however, that the chairman of the committee and I will demand written assurance from the Treasury Department and the administration that financing arrangements as I have described in this statement have not been entered into during this period allowed for technical comments.

SENATE—Monday, October 16, 1989

(Legislative day of Monday, September 18, 1989)

The Senate met at 2 p.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Let us remember Ruby Paone on her way to visit her 19-year-old niece, who was seriously injured in an accident.

*God that made the world and all things therein * * * giveth to all life, and breath, and all things; and hath made of one blood all nations * * * to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation; that they should seek the Lord * * .—Acts 17:24-27.

God of truth and justice, these words of St. Paul spoken on Mars Hill, Athens, call to mind the categorical claim of Thomas Jefferson: "God, who gave us life, gave us liberty," and his penetrating question: "Can the liberties of a nation be secure, when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are the gift of God?"

Help us distinguish between human rights and anarchy. Help us remember that the Constitution viewed human rights as inalienable because grounded in the belief of a Creator God who endowed them, that this Creator God is holy, and that these rights assume absolute morality as given in Ten Commandments, not "ten suggestions." Save us from the deceitful delusion that freedom means to do as one pleases—or what feels good. Save us from moral/ethical anarchy.

In His name who said, "Blessed are the poor in heart." Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, following the time for the two leaders this afternoon there will be a period for morning business until 3 o'clock, with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each. At 3 o'clock, the Senate will begin consideration of the constitutional amendment relating to flag desecration. There will be no rollcall votes today. Debate is expected to continue on the amendment until into this evening and to resume tomorrow.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S CONFUSION CONCERNING CHEMICAL WEAPONS ARMS CONTROL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, press reports over the past week indicate that the Bush administration now intends to continue producing chemical weapons even after signing a treaty which would ban the production and stockpiling of such weapons. If true, these reports are deeply disturbing and represent a step backward in the effort to control the international proliferation of chemical weapons. Unless the President clarifies his position on this issue, makes a decision and makes it known, it is likely that little progress will be made in Geneva toward achieving the multilateral treaty prohibiting chemical weapons which the President, ironically, has stated is one of his highest arms control priorities.

Reportedly unable to resolve deep bureaucratic divisions within his own administration, the President appears to have selected a so-called compromise approach in which we both build and destroy chemical weapons over a period of nearly 10 years. This compromise is likely to set back the effort at Geneva to negotiate a comprehensive ban on chemical weapons, since it serves to make legitimate those countries which are seeking to acquire chemical weapons, encouraging the very proliferation of chemical weapons which the treaty is intended to prevent.

This position is inconsistent not only with our, the United States, negotiating position at Geneva, but it is inconsistent even with the administration's own statements on chemical weapons arms control.

At the recent ministerial meeting in Wyoming between Secretary of State Baker and Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze, a number of initiatives in the area of chemical weapons arms control were announced. The two sides signed a memorandum of understanding concerning bilateral data exchanges and verification experiments, and they characterized this initiative as an effort to intensify efforts toward achieving the common goal of a global ban on all chemical weapons. Indeed, in the joint statement issued at the conclusion of their meeting, the two sides reaffirmed the objective of early conclusion of a comprehensive, verifiable and truly global ban on chemical weapons.

The issue of chemical weapons arms control was of sufficient priority for the administration in September that the ministerial meeting also produced a joint statement on chemical weapons. In that statement, the two sides stated that the early conclusion of a ban on the production and possession of chemical weapons is one of the highest priorities for the international community.

I repeat that, Mr. President. We stated as one of our highest priorities, a ban on the production of chemical weapons.

Two days after the conclusion of the ministerial meetings, President Bush addressed the United Nations and included substantial proposals concerning chemical weapons arms control in his remarks. President Bush noted that he had personally presented the draft text of a treaty banning the production and possession of chemical weapons at the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva 5 years ago. He reiterated his own commitment to a treaty that will eliminate all chemical weapons.

That the United States has been committed to achieving a total ban on the production of chemical weapons is made clear by reviewing the record of the negotiations in Geneva. The draft text of the Convention on the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons which President Bush himself presented in 1984 called for the signatories to the treaty to cease immediately all activity at each of its chemical weapons production facilities, except that required for closure. The current text being discussed in Geneva includes a similar provision:

> Each state Party with any chemical weapons production facility shall cease immediately all activity at each chemical weapons production facility except that required for closure.

It is quite clear from these excerpts of treaty text that the United States has steadfastly pursued the goal of banning production of chemical weapons, and the intention has been that production should cease soon after agreeing to the treaty. If, as a result of opposition from within his bureaucracy, President Bush has retreated from this objective, he is taking a major step backward in the effort to control the proliferation of chemical weapons.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

The pursuit of a comprehensive and global ban on chemical weapons is the right policy. Achieving such a ban would enhance our own security, that of our allies, and that of many countries in troubled regions of the world where the danger of the production of chemical weapons is most pronounced. Time and technology are not standing still. The evidence of the past 2 years is that many of the restraints—moral, political, and military—against the use of chemical weapons are weakening, and the appetities of many nations to possess these weapons appear to have been whetted.

The objective of achieving a global ban on chemical weapons is one which is widely shared in the Congress. This past June, in a letter to President Bush, I joined over 70 of my colleagues in pledging our support for the administration's efforts to seek a treaty banning the production and stockpiling of chemical weapons. President Bush should build on this support to seek early agreement on a treaty.

This is a time for vigorous American international leadership, for policies to match our own rhetoric, and for the United States to pursue a consistent and purposeful course. Timidity, mixed signals, inconsistent statements, and weakened commitments to longstanding objectives could result in the loss of an historic opportunity to prevent the spread of chemical arsenals around the globe.

RESERVATION OF LEADERS' TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time. And I reserve all of the leader time for the distinguished Republican leader.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the remaining time of the two leaders will be reserved.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend until the hour of 3 p.m. today, during which time Senators will be permitted to speak for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

The senior Senator from New York [Mr. MOYNIHAN] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

THOUGHT GIVEN TO VULNERABILITY OF THE PANAMA CANAL

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the distinguished President pro tempore for recognizing me. I rise on two subjects, of which the first is the Panama Canal.

We have heard on this floor in recent days and we have read in the press a great deal of criticism of President Bush's restraint in the matter of the use of force in the recent coup attempt against Gen. Manuel Noriega.

I was not privy to any of the discussions and do not wish to make more than a general comment which is intended—and I wish to be open about this—to be supportive of the President and to suggest why he may have felt that restraint was in order.

My comments, Mr. President, address the nature of the canal and its vulnerability to attack and closure. If I may say, the first great canal built in this country was the Erie along the Mohawk Valley. It opened the Great Lakes and the West to the United States and is a matter of local pride for New York and for this Senator.

The Panama Canal was built to take motorized traffic, as against mule-drawn barges. The fixtures, the engineering arrangements and the engineering equipment were produced by the General Electric Corp. in Schenectady, NY.

Mr. President, closing a canal through sabotage is about as simple an operation as anyone could undertake. It is a simple fact regarding the Panama Canal: The vulnerable point is the Culebra Cut. We now call it the Gaillard Cut after the American engineer who did it. It runs 8 miles north and south at the point of the Continental Divide. It cuts through the Continental Divide. It is about 500 feet wide and about 42 feet deep. It has huge steep slopes on each side. There is persistent sloughing off, sometimes close to landslides, from the cut down into the water. Dredges operate continually, Mr. President. About 1 million cubic yards of soil is removed every year. One million cubic yards come down routinely.

Mr. President, one howitzer drawn at random from the inventory of any field artillery regiment set 10 miles away with, may we say, 20 rounds, would reduce the Gaillard Cut to a blocked ditch in the course of a 20-minute barrage. If you did not have a howitzer handy, you could hike up with six men and, say, 1,000 pounds of plastic explosives and you would have a ditch filled. You could clean it up. It probably would not take more than 2 years, possibly 3, depending on the state of hostilities and the general atmosphere in the Canal Zone and its surroundings.

If you wanted to get into more exotic work, blowing up the dams that make Gatun Lake would require nothing more than civil war technology, Mr. President. It happened all the time with our canal systems during the Civil War, a century and a quarter ago. There we would be with a canal closed while we have treaty obligations to keep it open, keep access.

This would not be devastating to our economy. The development of the piggyback container freight train as a transcontinental device has changed the economics of the canal. But it would change our image in the world.

A President who gave some thought to the vulnerability of the canal to sabotage in the aftermath of a nationalist uprising might be deemed to be carrying out his constitutional duties with care and responsibility.

ST. CROIX

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, yesterday I flew to the island of St. Croix, which is, of course, one of the Virgin Islands. It is an American territory situated in the Leeward Island chain of the Caribbean. The island of St. Croix was struck by Hurricane Hugo as no other piece of territory. No other area in the path of the hurricane, which began in Guadeloupe and ended, of course, in Charleston, sustained such total destruction.

The hurricane hung over St. Croix, which is a small island, for almost 8 hours—from about 2200 hours on Sunday evening to about 0700 hours the following morning. Winds were just below the fiercest ever recorded, as an average, and gusted to about 200 miles an hour. The last such hurricane to hit the region was in 1928.

As you would imagine, Mr. President, the way of man, the world over, in such settings, the construction that followed in recent years, forget the hurricane of 1928, and the result is, Mr. President, that about half of the houses on the island are ruined. A more conservative view would be that about one-third are damaged beyond any prospect of repair and it would not be exaggerating to suggest that at least two-thirds have been damaged seriously. As with the pattern of hurricanes, you can see a situation where 500 yards apart one building will have disappeared and another building will be untouched.

The large hotels built along the northern coast east of Christiansted are empty and ruined. The major hospital had to be evacuated. Old Christiansted is badly damaged but intact. I am happy to report to this body that the counting house in which Alexander Hamilton began his career as a young man is intact. Alexander Hamilton's place is there, as indeed are the stone buildings of the 18th century. Almost all else is in ruin.

Mr. President, I have seen hurricanes and their aftermath from time to time. I served in the Caribbean in the Navy years ago. I have never seen the like of such damage.

The U.S. Government has responded superbly. The Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA] has been on the spot almost from the moment the eye of the hurricane left the shores of St. Croix.

I was there yesterday with Mr. Grant Peterson, the Deputy Director, and I have to tell you I have not seen anything the likes of this effort any time. To give you a sense of what was involved, Mr. President, there was no water, there was no food, there was no electricity and as a very important point there were no communications with St. Thomas, which is the main island. Charlotte Amalie is the capital. There was no radio communication. It was patched together by ham operators through the National Guard.

I toured with Governor Farrelly, a very able and distinguished chief executive there, and his equally able Lieutenant Governor Hodge and Gen. Robert L. Moorehead of the National Guard for the Virgin Islands. I can report that water has been restored. The efforts of the Geological Survey to do that have been magnificent. Power is back, not fully. Water is being made available but the island is a ruin. It could take generations to recover the prosperity that has developed in recent years, a prosperity primarily based on tourism.

There is the Amerada Hess refineries. There is some bauxite but basically the 50,000 inhabitants live off tourism. We had some bad panic in the early days. We have had to bring, Mr. President, a brigade of military police to patrol—brigade. Not a battalion, three battalions. I do not think we have had such deployment in an American territory in our history. Maybe, I do not know it.

People were evacuated with some of the accompanying mistakes that you cannot easily overcome. It was announced that the Coast Guard was evacuating American citizens. Well, I do not have to tell the distinguished President pro tempore they are all American citizens on St. Croix.

In the aftermath, the Corps of Engineers has done brilliant work; the U.S. Public Health Service. Every uniformed service of the U.S. Government was on that island yesterday—the Public Health Service, the Coast Guard, Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines, and the National Guard. Units from Mississippi and Alabama coupled together field hospitals.

In that hospital I ran into a group of doctors and nurses who had volunteered from Atlanta. GA. They obviously had been working night and day and day and night. I do not think they recognized who I was or what I was saying until I said I would give their greetings to SAM NUNN and WYCHE FOWLER. Then they got the point that I was from Washington.

Mr. President, there has to be a response. It has to be a long-term one. I hope the President, who certainly responded quickly with respect to the declaration of emergency, will now put in place a system that will tend to this matter over the next decade at the very least. The emergency is over. It was coped with, thanks to superb discipline and astonishing coordination by Government agencies and volunteer efforts from as far away as Guam. The Governor of Guam sent generating equipment. But now comes a much more difficult time, the emergency has passed and the devastation remains.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its courtesy in attending this matter.

RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLICAN LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Chair.

SEQUESTRATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today it is official; we have a sequester. Congress has missed its deficit cutting deadline again, and now the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings ax must fall, cutting $16.1 billion in spending across the board.

A lot of people in this town are saying sequester is not such a bad thing. Sequester cuts, they say, are at least real and permanent, while a good number of budget reconciliation cuts are short lasting and nothing more than smoke and mirrors.

RECONCILIATION IS BETTER THAN SEQUESTER

I do not buy that argument. The savings in budget reconciliation are not perfect, but that is not the point. We were elected to Congress to do a job; legislate. That means making tough decisions about what to cut, rather than allowing some automatic, meat-ax process to aimlessly make those choices for us.

Unfortunately, Congress has not provided much leadership on the budget front. Let us face it; we would not need GRH if Congress had been doing its job. Instead of making tough choices, we have been playing dodge ball.

Nevertheless, last Friday night, by stripping the reconciliation bill clean of all its legislative goodies, the Senate showed we are capable of making some very tough choices. If we want to send a signal to Wall Street and it is good the market is up some 40 points now maybe not because of what we did—and around the world that Congress is serious about the deficit, this is it; and I hope the House is listening.

Many of the items in that original Senate bill were good for Kansas and good for America, but the reconciliation process was never intended to be the last train out of the station for every Senator's bright idea. Reconciliation was supposed to cut the deficit. Period.

So, I believe the Senate acted responsibly when it decided that a 13-pound budget reconciliation bill was not the right vehicle for every goodie we could not pass through the regular process. Many of these provisions have never had a single witness from anywhere to testify for or against them in a hearing.

Moreover, our ability to amend or debate these items was severely restricted under the reconciliation process, as was pointed out very eloquently last Friday evening by the distinguished Presiding Officer, the President pro tempore, the senior Senator from West Virginia, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD.

By piling on our favorite provisions, we undercut the budget process, and worse, normal Senate procedure. Reconciliation, the last train out of the station, had come close to being the biggest train wreck of the year.

THE HOUSE MUST FOLLOW OUR LEAD

Now it is the House's turn to show some discipline. If the House accepts our changes—our leadership challenge—we can move quickly to cut $14.1 billion from the deficit, meet the $110 billion Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target, and restore the sequestered funds. If the House insists on clinging to its current overloaded package, it will guarantee a Presidential veto, a permanent sequester, and the well-deserved disgust of the American people.

I do not believe that will happen. I served in the House of Representatives for 8 years, and I can tell you the Senate has no monopoly on responsibility or wisdom, despite our sometimes, some would say, self-promotion as the "world's greatest deliberative body." The House will look carefully at what we have done, and it should. But, in the end, I hope the House will do the right thing and approve a deficit-reduction-only reconciliation bill. You can be certain that America and Congress' reputation will be better off for it.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of no quorum has been suggested.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Maine is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Chair.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A point of no quorum has been raised. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Kansas [Mrs. KASSEBAUM] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

RELEASE OF WALTER SISULU IN SOUTH AFRICA

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, South African nationalist leader Walter Sisulu and seven other prominent political prisoners were released yesterday from prison after more than a quarter century of confinement.

The tragedy of apartheid is clearly evident in the tragedy of individual lives in South Africa. Walter Sisulu's life dramatically reflects that tragedy. But his strength, courage, and determined leadership under duress also has become a symbol for hope not only within South Africa but around the world.

The road to true freedom for the prominent black leaders just released and for the black majority in South Africa is still a long and hard one. But the unconditional release of Walter Sisulu and the other political prisoners is an important step toward national reconciliation and a sign of new leadership on the part of President F.W. de Klerk. It is important for us to recognize this positive gesture by the new President of South Africa.

What follows over the next couple months is going to be critical for the future of South Africa. The unconditional release of the seven imprisoned leaders is widely being seen as a trial run for the release of Nelson Mandela, possibly later this year.

Neither the release of Mr. Sisulu nor Mr. Mandela should take place in a vacuum. Negotiations for national reconciliation must accompany the release of Mr. Mandela in order to ensure a peaceful transition from apartheid. I believe it is incumbent upon the South African Government to continue to build on the release of Walter Sisulu to create a climate for negotiations. Lifting of the state of emergency, lifting the ban on political parties, and removing the apartheid laws such as the Group Areas Act, are all measures which are needed to create such a climate.

Building confidence that negotiations can be conducted peacefully is also incumbent not only upon the Government but also the black majority. The call by Walter Sisulu and the other leaders of the opposition to South African blacks to conduct their protests peacefully in order not to jeopardize the release of Nelson Mandela is an important measure.

Mr. President, the events in South Africa over the weekend can open the door to peaceful change there. But this can only happen if all sides are committed to change and to seizing what can be a historic opportunity.

I yield back the remaining time, Mr. President, and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to inform my colleagues that today marks the 1,675th day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

On February 22, 1989, Terry Anderson was honored by the National Press Foundation. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this citation and a brief biographical note be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the citation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPECIAL CITATION: TERRY ANDERSON

The National Press Foundation honor Terry Anderson, held hostage since March 16, 1985, for his courage and his inspiration to journalists around the world. He has conducted himself throughout his ordeal with exceptional dignity and forbearance. The award, accepted by his sister, is intended to once again focus national attention on his plight.

Terry Anderson, the Associated Press correspondent kidnapped and held in Lebanon since March 16, 1985, is a veteran newsman who started his career in the Marine Corps.

He served six years as a Marine, as a combat correspondent in Vietnam and as a reporter, anchorman and station manager for the Armed Forces Radio and Television Service in Japan. He was discharged as a staff sergeant and spent three years as a radio and television newsman at KRNT and KCCI-TV in Des Moines, Iowa.

Mr. Anderson joined the AP in Detroit in May 1974 in a temporary slot, left after five months to work as an editor on the Ypsilanti (Mich.) Press, and rejoined the wire service in Louisville, KY, in April 1975. He later had AP posts as a foreign desk editor in New York, as newsman in Tokyo, and as news editor in Johannesburg.

The journalist first went to Lebanon on a temporary assignment soon after the Israeli invasion there in June 1982. In October, the assignment was made permanent and he became Beirut news editor. He was promoted to chief Middle East correspondent in September 1983.

Mr. Anderson was kidnapped at gunpoint on a Beirut street by three young men who sped off in a green Mercedes. He had spoken earlier of the perils facing a newsman in Lebanon. "There's no story worth getting killed for," he said, telling of situations in which gunmen had ordered reporters to leave areas in which they were trying to cover news events.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT PHYSICAL DESECRATION OF THE AMERICAN FLAG

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order previously entered, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 180, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 180) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States authorizing the Congress and the States to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I was 30 seconds too late in the request I am about to make, and that is, I ask unanimous consent that we be able to return to morning business for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Would the Senator like to speak out of order for 5 minutes?

Mr. BIDEN. I would like to speak out of order for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator is recognized for 5 minutes to speak out of order.

Mr. BIDEN. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. BIDEN pertaining to the introduction of S. 1757 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, may I respectfully inquire of the Chair as to whether the order of business is now Senate Joint Resolution 180?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the order of business.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to vote for the flag protection amendment to the Constitution, Senate Joint Resolution 180.

There are two central questions each Senator must consider in this debate: Why do we need an amendment to the Constitution? And, why do we need one now?

We need to pass Senate Joint Resolution 180 in my opinion, because it is the only effective way to protect our cherished flag. We need to pass this legislation now, in order to ensure that no time is lost in the event the recently passed flag statute, so ably sponsored by my distinguished friend, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is found to be unconstitutional.

In the aftermath of the Court's decision in Texas versus Johnson, many of us in Congress considered a variety of ways of ensuring the protection of the American flag. A majority of the Senate concluded that the best defense of the flag would be in the form of an amendment to the Constitution, and the result was the introduction of Senate Joint Resolution 180 cosponsored by 53 Senators, Democrats and Republicans alike.

The process of amending the Constitution is long, yes—but I argue properly and necessarily so. I do not view the amending of the Constitution lightly. But I do sincerely believe that the decision in Texas versus Johnson was wrong, and that the most effective way in which to redress the issue is by way of a constitutional amendment.

Many people have argued that the decision by the Supreme Court was a victory for free speech. However, I agree with Justice Stevens' dissent. He said:

I have no doubt that the interest in preserving [the] value [of the flag as a symbol of freedom, equal opportunity and religious tolerance] for the future is both significant and legitimate. Conceivably that value will be enhanced by the Court's conclusion that our national commitment to free expression is so strong that even the United States as ultimate guarantor of that freedom is without power to prohibit the desecration of its unique symbol. But I am unpersuaded.

Indeed, the decision by the Supreme Court could be viewed as a victory for those who view free speech as an absolute right. However, the right of free speech is not and never has been absolute. Chief Justice Rehnquist, in his dissent, cited the unanimous decision in Chaplinsky versus New Hampshire, which said in part:

Allowing the broadest scope to the language and purpose of the fourteenth amendment, it is well understood that the right of free speech is not absolute at all times and under all circumstances. There are certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of free speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any constitutional problem.

Justice Stevens further stated:

In Los Angeles City Council v. Taxpayers for Vincent * * * [This Court said] that "the first amendment does not guarantee the right to employ every conceivable method of communication at all times and in all places."

Mr. President, I have no quarrel with Gregory Johnson, or anyone else, for that matter, who expresses an opinion, positive or negative, about anything at all. I might disagree with them, but that is their right. On the other hand, I strongly disapprove of Gregory Johnson's action while expressing his opinion. The act of burning the American flag, I contend, was and is not, protected speech. As Justice Stevens stated, "It was Johnson's use of this particular symbol, and not the idea that he sought to convey by it or by his many other expressions, for which he was punished."

In response to the Court's decision, the Congress faces three options. First, we can do nothing. The argument given for this option is that the Court made the correct decision and no reason for redress exists. The second option my friend from Delaware has carried out in his usual competent way, and that is to enact a statute which would be content neutral, that is, would only prohibit the action, and not hinder an individual's right of free expression.

Mr. President, I supported the passage of H.R. 2978. It is my understanding from what I read in the media, Mr. President, and see in the media that the President of the United States probably will permit this statute to become law without his signature, thus, expressing his approval of the idea while indicating his commitment to a constitutional amendment.

I supported H.R. 2978 and I supported it, Mr. President, because it may work. I am a lawyer, not a great constitutional lawyer, but I believe there is a possibility that it might work. It just may be sufficient to adequately protect the American flag from the types of atrocious acts committed by Gregory Johnson in Dallas.

I would be the first to say that, if the courts uphold H.R. 2978, a constitutional amendment becomes unnecessary. However, we cannot know with certainty what the Supreme Court will do if faced with this statute. I believe, therefore, that we should continue to push forward with the third option, the constitutional amendment.

The constitutional amendment, I believe, would provide the surest protection against further acts of desecration.

Should the Supreme Court uphold the constitutionality of the flag desecration statute, Mr. President, there will be ample opportunity to stop the constitutional amendment. We do not have to go forward with it. But I remind my friends, it takes a two-thirds vote of both Houses to pass a constitutional amendment and send it on to the States. Thirty-eight States have to approve it. So it is a lengthy process that will undoubtedly take a number of years.

If, however, the Court eventually overturns the statute, we will have wasted considerable time by not starting to move forward with the constitutional amendment now. It is essential to move forward on both tracks. If the Congress is committed to protecting the flag, it should allow both tracks to proceed, Mr. President.

Former Chief Justice Warren, in his dissent in Street versus New York, stated succinctly:

I believe that the States and the Federal Government do have the power to protect the flag from acts of desecration and disgrace.

I believe, Mr. President, that the Supreme Court's closely divided 5 to 4 opinion was in error. I was delighted to support the statute which has passed here overwhelmingly. I am delighted the President will let it become law, albeit without his signature. I hope the court will reverse itself or find some reason to narrowly distinguish the other opinion and say the statute in this case is a good one.

But, Mr. President, I think courts are like human beings. They do not like to admit mistakes. I think there is an unlikely eventuality that will take place, and so I believe we are in jeopardy of protecting the flag if we do not turn to this constitutional amendment.

Mr. President, this body overwhelmingly gave approval to H.R. 2978, the flag protection bill. I was delighted to vote for it. I urge my colleagues to likewise support Senate Joint Resolution 180. Our flag, Mr. President, and our Nation deserve our support.

I thank the Chair. I thank my colleagues. I yield the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to express my strong support for Senate Joint Resolution 180, a proposed amendment to the Constitution authorizing the Congress and the States to prohibit the physical desecration of the American flag.

Immediately after the recent Supreme Court ruling in Texas versus Johnson which allows the contemptuous burning of the American flag, I introduced a proposed constitutional amendment to overturn that unfortunate decision.

Also, after bipartisan discussions with Members of the Senate, President Bush transmitted language for a 27th amendment to the Constitution addressing the Johnson decision. I joined with 51 of my colleagues as a cosponsor of the proposed amendment which we are considering today.

Last week, the House completed action and approved a Senate-passed version of a bill to punish certain physical acts of destruction with the flag. While I supported the statutory approach, I remain convinced that the bill which passed the Congress last week will likely not survive constitutional scrutiny in light of the Johnson decision.

As we learned from the hearings before the Judiciary Committee, there is sharp disagreement among some of our Nation's top constitutional scholars as to whether a Federal statute seeking to overturn the Johnson decision would be constitutional.

William P. Barr, Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel at the Department of Justice, representing the Attorney General of the United States testified on behalf of the administraton in favor of the proposed amendment. He stated that the President and the Attorney General were "convinced that, in light of the expansive decision of the Court, a statute simply would not suffice, and that the only way to ensure protection of the flag is through a constitutional amendment."

There were other constitutional scholars who testified and shared the opinion that only a constitutional amendment could be effective in reversing the Johnson decision. Robert H. Bork, former Judge for the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals, Charles J. Cooper, former Assistant Attorney General, Stephen B. Presser, professor of law at Northwestern School of Law, and Eugene W. Hickok, professor of Political Science of Dickinson College all testified that a constitutional amendment is needed to reverse the Johnson decision.

President Bush has indicated that he will allow the bill recently passed to become law but believes it will not withstand a constitutional challenge.

In the Johnson decision, the Supreme Court held that flag burning for expressive purposes is conduct protected by the first amendment. Further, if such conduct is to be prohibited, the Government's reason must be important and unrelated to expression.

Efforts to protect the flag as our symbol of nationhood is inherently and necessarily related to expression. It is the intent of the sponsor and cosponsors of this proposed constitutional amendment to unequivocally authorize the Congress and the States to prohibit flag burning and other contemptuous acts of desecration with the Flag.

I firmly believe that an overwhelming majority of American citizens want the Congress to allow for the prohibition of flag burning as communicative conduct.

The Supreme Court clearly states in the Johnson decision that the Government's interest in protecting the flag as a treasured national symbol does not overcome an individual's first amendment right to burn the flag for communicative purposes.

As a statement of national policy, should we be content with a Federal statute which some feel equivocates our respect for the flag by avoiding the issue of contemptuous conduct with the flag. It is my belief that while the bill recently passed technically evades the subject of contemptuous desecration of the flag, it may well be ruled unconstitutional because it would prohibit that very type of flag destruction.

If we are truly serious with efforts to protect the flag as our most unique and precious symbol of cherished American values, as the embodiment of American democracy, then a 27th amendment to the Constitution should be adopted.

PRE-JOHNSON

Mr. President, prior to the Supreme Court ruling in Texas versus Johnson, the U.S. Congress and 48 states had adopted legislation to protect the physical integrity of the American flag. The Supreme Court in the Johnson decision struck down these laws and has brazenly said no to the American public who have spoken through the Congress and 48 State legislatures.

When the legislature in my home state of South Carolina and presumably the 47 other States adopted laws to protect the flag, they believe their action was on solid constitutional footing. Now the Supreme Court has come along and dramatically changed the landscape concerning protection for the American flag. The Congress, representing the American public, now has a responsibility to restore to the States their proper authority to protect the flag.

Mr. President, there have been arguments by opponents of this proposed constitutional amendment that any such amendment will encourage a variety of widely differing State laws protecting the flag. I would respond by once again noting that there are currently 48 States that have already passed flag protection statutes. It is my belief that once a constitutional amendment is adopted, these States would simply allow their current statutes to remain in place and would not rush to enact new ones, unless they found it advisable to do so.

BEGINNING THE AMENDMENT PROCESS

Mr. President, our Founding Fathers understood that the Constitution would, on occasion, need to be amended and they included a deliberately complicated procedure in the Constitution for amending that great document.

In article V of the Constitution, two-thirds of both Houses of Congress can proposed amendments or two-thirds of the State legislatures can call a Constitutional Convention for proposing amendments. These proposed amendments become a part of our Constitution when ratified by three-fourths of the State legislatures. Incidentally, the last method I mentioned has never been used to amend the Constitution.

A proposed constitutional amendment could take years before it is considered in the requisite number of State legislatures.

In view of the probability that the recently passed flag statute may not withstand constitutional scrutiny, we should take action now to pass this proposed amendment so the State legislatures can begin considering its ratification.

There are some who oppose amending the Constitution to overturn a Supreme Court decision. I hasten to point out that since adoption of the Bill of Rights, the first 10 amendments, one-fourth of the remaining amendments to the Constitution were proposed to overturn particular Supreme Court decisions. It is not a novel idea to amend the Constitution in response to actions taken by the Supreme Court.

Amending the Constitution is a serious matter. It should only be entered into after careful thought and open debate in response to demanding circumstances. The record of the hearings and congressional debate coupled with the public outcry against the Johnson decision attest that we face circumstances which demand an amendment to the Constitution.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, we are a blessed Nation. American citizens enjoy freedoms and liberties which are the envy of the world. There is a wide variety of political views in this country and yet we overwhelmingly support the fundamental ideals and traditions of the American community. As Americans, we have every right to question Government policy and to express ourselves in a myriad of ways. Prohibiting the contemptuous desecration of the flag will not deny citizens their right to freedom of speech. There are any number of other ways to express discontent with governmental decisions. Those avenues should and will go unimpeded.

What we are attempting to establish with this proposed constitutional amendment is national policy concerning the flag. I firmly believe that the American public looks upon the flag as the most recognizable and revered symbol of democracy which has endured throughout our history.

It is incumbent upon this Congress to swiftly pass this proposed constitutional amendment and send it to the States to allow the American public through their legislatures the opportunity to be heard on this important issue.

I urge my colleagues to join the sponsors and cosponsors of this proposed amendment as we seek to protect our most cherished symbol of democracy from contemptuous desecration.

Mr. BIDEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BIDEN].

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, today we embark on what in my view is one of the most solemn tasks any Member of the U.S. Senate can engage in; that is, the task of deciding whether to amend the U.S. Constitution, a document that, together with the Magna Carta, stands as one of the greatest monuments to liberty in the history of all mankind.

Since June 21, when the Supreme Court decided the case of Texas versus Johnson, there has been a lot of talk and a lot of rhetoric about the need for a constitutional amendment, particularly the one proposed in Senate Joint Resolution 180, about what the amendment would do and what that amendment means.

All this talk and all this rhetoric have produced, in my view, a lot of myths, unintentionally, I might add, because I do not doubt for a moment the sincerity of those in this body who believe that we need to amend the Constitution in order to protect the flag. But nonetheless, Mr. President, a number of myths have arisen.

Of these, there are about eight that I think need to be set straight. So before we vote on this constitutional amendment, Mr. President, I think it is important, as I am sure the Presiding Officer and all my colleagues do, that we are sure what we are voting on. There are all kinds of constitutional amendments. One could be for a constitutional amendment to protect the flag intellectually and philosophically and believe that it is important enough to be made apart of the Constitution, but that same Senator might very well reject one proposed amendment to protect the flag and accept another.

So anyone who shares my view that the amendment that we are going to vote on sometime this week is not the appropriate amendment need not reach the conclusion that under no circumstances could one or should one pass an amendment. There are all types of amendments and the wording of these amendments is critically important.

I know my colleagues have been incredibly busy. One need only turn on the local news to see the hours this body has been keeping and the degree of difficulty of the issues with which we have been dealing to know that we have been very much engaged, and I suspect that not all of my colleagues have had the opportunity at this point to look—which is the reason for debate—extremely closely at the wording and impact of the amendment in question.

Mr. President, in my capacity as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I had the honor, privilege, and duty of spending the August recess listening to some of the finest minds in America who both believe we should amend and we should not amend the Constitution. Some would testify that we should amend the Constitution but the particular amendment in question was not the way to do it. Others, believe we should do nothing, including the Biden legislation or similar Biden-Roth legislation or similar legislation which has now passed both Houses and the President indicates he will allow it to become law. I understand it is literally today that it arrives on the President's desk. So I have had the opportunity to listen to and speak with some of the best minds in this country both in favor of and against the amending of the Constitution and this particular amendment.

So I have reached the conclusion that on this particular amendment there have been, as I said earlier, some myths that have arisen. There are those who at this point think they may be for it who think it does certain things that it does not do and think it does not do other things which it does do.

So before we vote on this amendment, Mr. President, we had better know what we are voting on, and we need to separate fact from fiction, and truth from myth. And I emphasis once again that I do not think any Member of this body for or against this constitutional amendment is intentionally or would intentionally mislead deliberately or propose something that they thought to be other than the truth.

But we have a special responsibility because, when it comes to amending the Constitution, the usual checks and balances do not apply. Once we approve a constitutional amendment, the President cannot sign it or veto it. The Supreme Court cannot strike it down. Our vote is final, the final say in Washington.

Make no mistake about it. The language of what we adopt here will be the language that is adopted and added to the Constitution. What we send to the States is unalterable. The States cannot change a single word, a phrase, a comma or a period. They can only vote up or down, yes or no, on the particular constitutional amendment that we send to them—ratify or reject. Caution, restraint, and the utmost care must be our guide as we debate and vote this week on the proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. President, today I intend to try, at least from my perspective, to separate fact from fiction and truth from myth with respect to the administration's proposed constitutional amendment.

The first myth is that the amendment makes it illegal to destroy, to desecrate, or to harm the flag. This amendment, if we passed it tomorrow, the House passed it tomorrow and all the States required passed it tomorrow, the moment it became an amendment to the Constitution would do no such thing. In and of itself it would not stop lawn flag burning, and it would not stop what everyone concludes desecration means. It would do nothing.

If 67 Members of the body, 291 Members of the House and 38 States ratify this amendment, even if all that happens, it will still be legal to burn the flag, to mutilate, defile or deface it or do anything else to it, including destroy it.

The reason is simple. All the proposed amendment does is permit Congress and the 50 States, should they so choose, to make these acts illegal. The amendment itself does nothing, not a thing to protect the flag on its own.

The second myth is that the proposed constitutional amendment does more to protect the flag than the legislation we passed 2 weeks ago and which will become law of the land in 10 days. President Bush said last week that we need this amendment because the statutes we have passed are not enough to protect the flag.

Well, Mr. President, nothing could be further from the truth. In 10 days, it will be the law of the land that "whoever knowingly mutilates, defaces or physically defiles, burns, maintains on the floor or ground or tramples upon the flag of the United States, shall be either fined or put in jail or both."

It will be against the law to burn the flag at any time, anywhere, under any circumstances, except if you are disposing of the flag that becomes worn and dirty through everyday use, and in any other situation, if you destroy the flag, you will go to jail or be fined, period.

I submit, Mr. President, that the law we passed 2 weeks ago will provide the broadest protection for the flag that is possible. We have already made it illegal to burn the flag in every circumstance, save one. No greater protection is possible. So why do the administration and many of my colleagues want this amendment? Let me explain, from my perspective, at least.

Under the Texas versus Johnson decision, the Supreme Court said in effect, if we want to make flag burning illegal, we better make it illegal in all circumstances, and not just to single out offensive flag burning. So that is what we did with the statute we passed 2 weeks ago. We made it illegal all across the board to burn the flag, other than in those circumstances where it is not provided under military code and the Boy Scouts, et cetera, where you can burn a flag as a proper means of disposal, all of the flag that is no longer a fitting symbol.

We do not need a constitutional amendment to pass that sort of blanket flag protection, but the administration wants a constitutional amendment. Why? Mr. President, what I am about to say may seem a bit strange, but I will, over the course of this debate, go into great detail, if that is appropriate, in laying out word for word the testimony of the administration, because I wonder, why do they want this. If in fact this statute we passed overwhelmingly here, in both Houses, Republican and Democrats alike, is unconstitutional, well, clearly the President would veto it. For, as he pointed out in another circumstance, a chief executive officer has to make a judgment on his own, whether or not something is constitutional or otherwise. If he thought it unconstitutional, he clearly would veto it. If in fact he thought it constitutional, then he would let it become law.

So why are we pushing on this amendment, since the President has concluded that there is this overwhelming prospect of being constitutional; otherwise he would, under his oath and all that he has said in another context—we remember in the middle of a campaign when a former Governor did not sign into law a statute that would have been, in the mind of that Governor unconstitutional, even though the State legislature passed it, relating to the flag and the Pledge of Allegiance, the President pointed out properly that the Chief Executive Officer must make his own judgment. If he believes it is unconstitutional, he understands; if he does not, he should let it become law. The President is letting this become law, the statute.

I am convinced the President is not just being political. The articles written that the President is just being political, by those who want to criticize him, this is not merely politics; this is too important for a President to play with the Constitution for politics.

So why the need for the amendment? Well, the conclusion I reached is because they want to punish only offensive flag burning—that is, only those circumstances where the flag is burned where they find the burning offensive. They want to discriminate among flag burnings.

The administration wants the States to be able to ask all sorts of questions before deciding whether to arrest someone for burning a flag. They want States to ask first, who burned the flag; why did they burn the flag; what did they say when they burned the flag; did anyone see them burn the flag; and was anyone offended by the burning of the flag? Only once these questions have been asked and answered does the administration want the States to decide whether or not to arrest someone for burning the flag. They want the States to first know whether it is a well-kept businessman in a three-piece Brooks Brothers suit who burned the flag or a long-haired college dropout with torn jeans and an earring who burned the flag.

They want the States to first know whether an emotional veteran has offered the burning of a flag as a symbol of the loyalty and sacrifice of his fallen comrades or as a symbol of protest.

I asked during the hearings, I say to my friend from North Carolina, what would be the situation; why do you not like my statute, whether or not you think it would pass constitutional muster? And the administration witness said, well, because it is content neutral. It would make all flag burning illegal.

I said, let me ask you, how would you feel about someone, an emotionally committed Vietnam veteran, kneeling down before the Vietnam Memorial and very ceremoniously taking a brand new flag and folding it and then lighting a match to it and saying, I am burning this flag in the name of all the brave men who died, who are listed on this monument, to sanctify their death as a commitment to this country? They said, we do not want to arrest that guy. The flag is being burned, a brand new, nice, clean flag. But, if that same veteran knelt down with a motorcycle jacket on and an earring in his ear and said in anger, I am burning this flag because my brothers and their friends—and named them on the monument—died in vain, and I am angry, and he burned the flag, they want to be able to arrest that guy.

They want to get at, Mr. President, the reason for this amendment; the way it is worded, is to be able to arrest some people who burn a flag in a circumstance that they find offensive, but not arrest other people who burn a flag in a circumstance that would not have any ill intent when the burning was done. Now, I am not talking about ceremonial burning, which the Biden amendment, as altered, put into the statute. Under the statute now that will become law in 10 days, you will be able to burn flags under military ceremonies and other appropriate ceremonies. It is legal to do it that way, but all other flag burning will be illegal.

The reason I dwell on this point for the moment, this amendment is designed to get at certain types of speech, not all speech, only those which people find offensive. This is not just about protecting this national symbol.

For me, God bless him, the emotional veteran offering the flag up as a sacrifice of his love for his country I find also wrong because the physical integrity of the flag is what I am intending to protect. It should not be burned. It should not be destroyed.

Back to why this amendment. The administration wants to know whether someone who is burning the flag on January 22 to commemorate the lives lost in the Challenger disaster is one who is doing it to protest space policy that they believe led to the disaster or as a holy sacrifice to those who lived under this constitutional amendment. States would be able to make that kind of distinction. You are going to go to jail because you burned the flag in a way I did not like, and you are not going to go to jail even though you burned the same flag but you did it in the way I like it.

That is what this is all about, Mr. President. The answers to these questions are not necessarily under what will soon be the law of the land. That is because the law we passed protects the flag in all circumstances, not just in some. It protects the flag whether it is burned in public or in private. It protects the flag no matter how the person burning it is dressed or what he or she says, and it protects the flag no matter what motivates the person burning the flag.

The amendment in contrast, Mr. President, is intended to allow the States to pick and choose so that flag burning is illegal in certain situations, in certain circumstances, and involving certain people. Our statute punishes all flag burners. The administration wants to punish only anti-American flag burning and allow pro-American flag burning if that were to occur. They need to change the Constitution, Mr. President, to do that.

The statute which will soon become law does not allow them to do that, Mr. President. To burn is to burn is to burn, and it is illegal.

But before we support the change the adminstration wants, let us remember which goes further to protect the flag—the statute or the amendment. The answer is clear, simple, and unequivocal. The statute goes much further in protecting the flag.

Assuming that it is constitutional—as I do and the President must or he would not let it become law—so the first myth, the statute is broader in its application and does more to protect the flag from being desecrated than the amendment.

And this leads me to the third myth surrounding the proposed amendment, the myth that the amendment does not amend the first amendment. Everyone says when they come before us here that we revere the Constitution, that our intent is not to, for the first time in our history, even propose let alone vote on proposed amending of the first amendment. Nobody wants to say that. At least no one I have heard wants to say that. Therefore, a myth has arisen. And that myth is that if we pass this amendment, it will do nothing to the first amendment, it will do no violence.

Mr. President, 200 years of history have shown that the first amendment means the Government cannot pass laws that distinguish between certain types of speech and certain ideas, saying some are acceptable and some are not, punishing the former and not the latter—this discrimination the first amendment prohibits.

I want to reiterate. The essence of the first amendment is that the Federal Government and, in turn, the States have now ruled 60 years ago that the Bill of Rights applies to them, the essence of the first amendment is the State, local, or Federal cannot discriminate among types of speech. It did not say I like that kind, I do not like that kind. That is the essence of the first amendment. Cut everything else away, that is what it is about because we have, as a people, a greater faith in the individual and the collective wisdom of Americans to choose and choose what is right than we do to have the Government tell us what is right and what is wrong as it relates to speech.

Mr. President, that is exactly the kind of discrimination that would be allowed under the administration's proposed amendment and that is why the proposed amendment would in fact amend the first amendment. This probably sounds a little strong, a pretty strong statement from a person who believes that it is possible to draft a constitutional amendment to protect the flag that does not do violence to the first amendment.

That is my position. That has been my position from the outset, and it remains my position after the testimony that I have heard over almost an 8-week period. It is possible to draft a narrow constitutional amendment protecting that flag and not doing violence to the first amendment.

But I believe, Mr. President, and hope to be able to show to my colleagues over the next several days or however long the debate takes, that the amendment in question does just that. It does not protect the flag as much as it should be protected and it does alter the first amendment because it says States will be able to discriminate among the various types of activities relating to destroying the flag.

On the face of it, of course, the amendment sounds innocuous enough. All it says is "The Congress and the States shall have the power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States of America."

On the surface who could be against that? I cannot be against that on the surface. What we have is a wolf in sheep's clothing I think unintended. I do not think that has been thought through very well.

Just listen to the testimony of William Barr, head of the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel and the chief witness for the administration at the hearings held before the Judiciary Committee on the constitutional amendment.

And I might add for the record, I asked the Attorney General to testify, or any member of the administration, and they said the spokesperson for the administration on the constitutional amendment on the flag is Mr. Barr, a very qualified, bright attorney.

He came before us and he said that this amendment, the administration's amendment, one would "permit the legislatures to focus on the kind of conduct that is really offensive."

I know not many of my colleagues are here today but their staffers who will be listening, please at least know what you are voting on. He said this amendment and I quote "will permit the legislatures to focus on the kind of conduct that is really offensive."

That means certain kinds of conduct, certain types of conduct, as associated with desecrating the flag, they may not find offensive. They only want to get the kind that they find offensive.

Keep in mind, by the way, that was the problem with the Texas case. It said that if you are only going to detemine whether or not to send this fellow to jail on whether or not he offended someone else by his actions. Then you are obviously getting at speech. If one guy stood up there and burned the flag and had not offended anyone, then he is not guilty of anything. But if another guy stands and burns the flag and says "Red, white, and blue, I spit on you," which was what was said by Mr. Johnson, that is offensive. So put that guy in jail, and not this guy in jail.

That is not protecting the flag. That is saying I am going to censure certain kinds of speech. That is why I wrote the statute that I wrote. It said both of them should go to jail because I want to protect the flag not discriminate between speech that I like and speech that I do not like.

Obviously, I do not like the language "red, white, and blue, I spit on you," but I also would not like a businessman standing up and saying, "I am burning this flag to demonstrate how well-made American products are, and the flag is a symbol of our progress."

That would offend me as much as the other fellow. As I said during the hearing, I do not think there is a Senator in here, if, on the way out tonight, walking down the stairs, in one of the trash containers you saw a flag draped over the container burning with no one around, I expect every one of us would have the immediate same reaction—and this is not a debating ploy; I believe this from the bottom of my heart—every one of us would rush over and pull that flag out and try to put out the fire. Because it is our national symbol; not because the fellow who put it in there did it in anger or by accident. It does not matter. It is our symbol.

But, what the administration and Mr. Barr says is, permit the legislatures to focus on the kind of conduct that is really offensive. He went on to say, and that "offering legislatures the option of prohibiting only intentionally contemptuous physical desecration is a significant advantage of the amendment over the statute."

Did you hear what I just said? The administration says you should give the legislatures the option of prohibiting only the intentionally physical desecration of the flag, intentionally, and here is the important word, contemptuous—contemptuous.

So what this amendment says and the reason why the administration wrote it as broadly as it did, or narrowly depending on your focus, is because the statute I wrote was too broad for them. They only want to put people in jail that they did not like when they do something intentionally or unintentionally to the flag and not those that they like. That is why the first amendment is at risk here for the first time in over 200 years, Mr. President.

Charles Cooper, another key witness for the administration, was even more frank. He said "No one really wants a neutral flag statute." And he questioned whether it is true, in his words "That all we want to do is to protect the physical integrity of the flag."

Now, again, I ask my colleagues to listen to that. Mr. Cooper says, "Look, all we want to do is protect that flag. Or do we not want to do something more than protect the flag? Do we not want to be able to affect speech as it is associated with that flag?"

He says, "Biden, all you want to do is protect the flag. That is not what we want. We want to do more than that."

Mr. President, can anyone—and I know no one is here now, and this is a bit of a rhetorical thing because I am sure others will want to debate this with me tomorrow and the next day—but I challenge anyone to tell me that that is not designed to deal with speech.

Some may think that that is a good thing to do. But I am just trying to deal with the myth. The myth is, do not worry, fellows and ladies of the Senate, if you vote for this amendment, you will do nothing to the first amendment. Let us face it straight up. If you vote for this amendment—and it is the intention of the sponsor, the President, the administration—the intention is to impact on and limit for the first time in our history the first amendment.

Now you may want to do that. I disagree with you. You may want to do that, though, and it is your right. And it would be constitutional to do it, by the way. I am not saying anybody who wants to do that is un-American or bad or not a good Senator or violating the Constitution. But let us deal with the myth, Mr. President. Make no mistake about it, it is the intention of the drafter of this legislation to be able to go after speech, certain kinds of speech; that which we find offensive will be punished and that which is not offensive will not be punished.

Indeed, Mr. President, the Congress, the administration, to be more precise, does not want a neutral statute or a neutral amendment because that would not give Congress and the States the power to pick and choose among the views that it agrees and disagrees with, punishing the latter and not the former. They will only be satisfied if the Congress and the 50 States have that power, the power to censor. Indeed, what the administration is advocating is something that not even the most conservative Justices on the Supreme Court have advocated—allowing Government to censor views that it does not like.

And in fairness to conservatives on the Court, I might add they have been the strongest proponents of not allowing Government to censor. It is no accident that the two most conservative members recently added to the Court were the two members who voted to set Gregory Johnson free; the two most conservative new appointees, Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Scalia.

This amendment will amend the first amendment because we will be saying for the first time in our history that the Government can outlaw an action if the action contains an idea that the Government does not like.

If this amendment passes, a legislature could, under the amendment, pass a law saying that no foreign-owned corporation could fly the American flag. I do not think, quite frankly, I find that offensive.

I must admit—maybe I should not admit it, but I must, that when I see—I ride by a Toyota dealership—maybe it is because I come from a State that produces so many American cars—I live in a State that I think is the second-largest producer of American automobiles per capita in the Nation. And I ride by the Toyota dealership and there is a flag, 50 by 50 or 50 by 60, flying, an American flag above a Toyota dealership, foreign-made cars putting Americans out of work. Let us not get into whether they should or should not be putting them out of work. But I must admit it bothers me.

Now, were I a State senator instead of a U.S. Senator, and this amendment were law—this is no exaggeration, Mr. President, this is fact—I could go under this constitutional amendment to my State legislature and I could get the bulk of my colleagues in the State senate—because we are such an overwhelmingly pro-American automotive State, so many jobs are at stakes; it would not be rational, I admit; it would not be rational; we all know that all politics is not all rational—I could get through the State senate a law saying that foreign dealerships could not fly the American flag. And it would be legal. It would be legal under this amendment.

Now, that might not bother some of you. You would say, that is OK. Let me put it this way: I would not get in trouble in my State for introducing such an amendment. I do not doubt whether the Senators from Michigan would get in trouble. I imagine that if in the State of West Virginia such an amendment were put in the State legislature saying that no imported oil dealership that had imported oil in such a coal State could fly the American flag, I doubt whether many people would get in trouble in West Virginia voting for that.

I do not know your State, obviously, Mr. President, as well as you, or no one knows it as well as you. I expect it is not that much different than mine. I could go through States all across the Nation and give you examples of how that could happen. It would be legal. Is that what we want this amendment to do? Is that what we are about protecting the flag?

A State legislature could make a law saying that only a Republican and Democratic and no other could fly the flag at their convention and use it in their advertisements. Literally, that can be done under this amendment.

Mr. President, we have all been around awhile. Do you remember the American Party? Pretty powerful party in my State. George Wallace won my State in 1968 in the Democratic primaries, the convention.

What was the symbol of the American party? The American flag. The legislature, controlled by the Democrats and Republicans could under this amendment, pass a law saying that the American Party could not use the American flag as their symbol and it would be constitutional.

I am not saying they would. But strange things have happened, Mr. President. Is that what we want to do? Is that protecting the flag? Or is that doing what the administration wants, being able to choose among certain actions relating to the flag, because the bill says "physical desecration"?

Mr. President, my State legislature and yours and the other 50 States, under this amendment, could each pass a law saying that no one other than a U.S. citizen could purchase or display a flag. That could be done. It would be totally legal.

They could pass a law saying that artists who are Communist or Socialist could not paint the American flag.

They could pass a law saying that Mr. Mapplethorpe, or whatever his name was, the guy who caused so much controversy here, now passed away, and we debated over obscenity of publicly financed art projects, that he could not paint an American flag. And that would be constitutional and legal.

All these laws censor certain viewpoints, Mr. President, and all these laws could be passed under this proposed amendment. I could give many more examples. I will not.

But let no one be mistaken, then; this amendment is intended to override the first amendment. It would allow the States to do things that for 200 years they have never been allowed to do.

And this brings me, Mr. President, to the fourth myth surrounding this amendment, the myth that it will accomplish what its proponents intend it to accomplish. That is, ironically, this amendment as written may not even reverse Texas versus Johnson.

I see my friends from Mississippi and Iowa on the floor, looking at me like: Well, what is he about to say here? I ask my colleagues, because they are right fellows who take this seriously, to listen to what I am about to say on this one point.

There is a body of thought and constitutional expertise that says even if this amendment were passed and there was enabling legislation in the States, it would not overrule Texas versus Johnson, even if it were in the Constitution.

Let me explain why. One witness, a professor named Eugene Hickok, a supporter of the constitutional amendment who testified before our committee and a former special assistant at the Office of Legal Counsel during the Reagan administration, quite candidly said in our committee the following:

> As it currently states, the proposed amendment would not provide Congress with any more authority to protect the flag than it has at this moment. Amending the Constitution with the language suggested by the President would do nothing to alter the constitutional landscape carved out by this court in Johnson.
> When writing legislation under the authority of this proposed amendment, the Congress would still have to consider the first amendment and the Court's understanding of how that amendment might limit Congress' ability to protect the flag.

What Professor Hickok, and what Prof. William Van Alstyne and what Prof. Walter Dellinger, and what Prof. Gordon Baldwin, and what Prof. Brady Williamson, all of whom agree with Professor Hickok, mean, is this: The proposed amendment says that Congress and the States "shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag."

It reads a lot like other clauses in the Constitution that give Congress and the States power to do something. But whenever the Congress and the States exercise that power, they are limited in how far they can go by the protection of the Bill of Rights and other amendments.

Let me give an example. The 16th amendment to the Constitution says that Congress has the power to impose income taxes, not unlike this amendment would say the Congress has the power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag. The 16th amendment, which is already in the Constitution, and operative, says the Congress shall have the power to impose income tax, just as this proposed amendment says that Congress and the States shall have the power to prohibit desecration.

But the power of Congress to impose taxes does not mean that it can impose one tax on white Americans and another, greater tax, on black Americans. Congress, in other words, still has to abide by the equal protection clause of the 5th and 14th amendments when it imposes taxes.

So although we put a 16th amendment in law saying we can impose taxes, that 16th amendment is governed by and limited by the other provisions of the Constitution.

Let us take a look at it another way. Suppose we pass a constitutional amendment to balance the budget and it says something as simple as Congress must balance the Federal budget, which is not a bad idea.

Let us assume we had such an amendment. The Congress could not then proceed to balance the budget by taxing Jews one amount, Protestants another amount, and Catholics another amount, Why? Because despite a constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget, the Congress must still abide by the first amendment, which allows the freedom of exercise of religion.

So, just as the power to tax and the power to balance the budget is limited by the Bill of Rights, so, too, would be the power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States of America. It would be limited by the existing amendments.

Interestingly, my good friend from Alaska, Senator STEVENS, whom I suspect is for this amendment, understood this point very well when, in 1970, he introduced a constitutional amendment to prohibit the burning of the flag. That year he proposed an amendment to protect the flag. His amendment said, straight up: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this Constitution, the Congress shall have the power to—"and then he went on. Because he understood, I expect, Mr. President, that unless we say in the amendment "Notwithstanding any other provision of the Constitution," then all other provisions of the Constitution pertain and limit this amendment, just as they limit the 16th amendment in taxation.

On the other hand, had the 16th amendment been written as follows: "Notwithstanding any other provision of the Constitution," then this body could stand here and say: We are going to tax white people more than black people. We are going to tax women more than men. They could do that, Mr. President.

They could do that, Mr. President, if it had said, "notwithstanding any other provision of the Constitution." But absent that language, it means that all other provisions of the Constitution pertain. We cannot tax men more than women or women more than men, and we cannot say by this amendment to the Constitution that it can override the first amendment, which is the stated purpose of this amendment.

Mr. President, Professor Hickok put it well when he said—and remember now, he is a supporter of amending the Constitution to prohibit the burning of the flag. He said:

> If you feel that the Johnson case is bad constitutional law, it seems to me that you should be straightforward in your response to it as opposed to trying to find ways to get around having to say what you really think.

There is only one reason why this amendment does not say, Mr. President, "notwithstanding any other provision of the Constitution." It is because they want to perpetuate the myth that you can vote for this amendment and not amend the Constitution. But irony of all ironies, Mr. President, by failing to be straightforward and honest about what you are intending to do, the administration has produced an amendment that is meaningless because it cannot—it cannot—override the first amendment as written. And that is the stated purpose. Then you cannot discriminate against certain kinds of flag burning; then you are back to Biden, all burning, a content-neutral amendment.

I realize, not that there is anyone here incapable of following that, but it is such an unusual argument and, quite frankly, Mr. President, one I had to be educated to after four long hearings over an 8-week period. But it is quite simple. There is a body of constitutional expertise in this country that says—and they are right in this Senator's opinion—that unless you say, notwithstanding any other provision of the Constitution, you will not even have been able to overrule Texas versus Johnson because Texas versus Johnson was struck down by the Supreme Court of the United States of America on the grounds that it violated the first amendment.

So for all this effort the President would have us undergo, with all this effort of getting supermajorities in this body and in the States, we will have produced a gnat; we will have given birth to a gnat; we will have, in fact, solved nothing. Fortunately, we will have solved it, because we already passed the statute which will be law.

But think about that a minute. It does not even overrule Texas versus Johnson unless you are straight up and say: "I want to amend the first amendment." And why does no one want to say that, Mr. President? Because they want to perpetuate the myth that we are not the first Congress in the history of this Nation to propose limiting the Bill of Rights. That is why, or at least that is the only thing this Senator can come up with. I can think of no other rational explanation. It does not mean there is not one. I just cannot think of one, and I have been searching for a long time.

Mr. President, I think, if nothing else, the curtain has been lifted. They either have to say what they mean in the amendment or face up to the fact that they have offered an amendment that means nothing, absolutely nothing, nothing at all, and that it would do nothing, absolutely nothing, to reverse Texas versus Johnson.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that the administration does not agree with Professor Hickok and the other witnesses who testified on the proposed amendment who are worried it will do nothing. But, if you agree with the administration that they are wrong, the situation only gets worse and not better.

Let us assume, again, as we lawyers do, and the Chair is an attorney as is the manager of this bill and the Senator from South Carolina. We are attorneys. Let us argue in the alternative, as we say. Let us assume that Professor Hickok and Senator BIDEN and others are wrong about the meaninglessness of this amendment. Let us assume without saying, "notwithstanding any other provision of the Constitution," that this amendment could overrule the first amendment. Let us assume that for the sake of argument, which is the administration's argument, I am certain. We do not end with a better result; we end with a worse result. The reason is this: If their proposed amendment is interpreted to override the first amendment, which it has to do in order to reverse Texas versus Johnson—we all admit that, and I assume no one will challenge that—in order to overrule Texas versus Johnson by this amendment, it has to affect the first amendment.

Let us assume it is able to overrule Texas versus Johnson. There is nothing in its text to indicate that it does not override the entire Constitution then. If that is the case, we really have entered uncharted waters. If the amendment overrides the first amendment without saying so, maybe it also overrides the sixth amendment, guarantee of jury trials when a person is charged with desecrating the flag. If it overrides the first amendment without saying it, why does it not override the sixth amendment? Why could we not then say anyone charged with burning the flag, such a heinous offense, that they are the only people charged with a criminal offense that do not have a right to a jury trial, because it follows if you can overrule the first, why not the sixth?

There is no logic that would keep that from happening that I am aware of. If it overrides the first, as the administration argues, then it overrides the fourth amendment so the State can conduct general house-to-house warrant with seizures looking for evidence of desecration, or, in the case of desecration of a flag, it could in an attempt to corroborate what was done—let us assume that there was a videotape taken on the burning of the flag, and the person who burned the flag had it taken and gave it to someone else and they had it in their home. Right now, in order to get that videotape, there would have to be probable cause to get a search warrant. Under this amendment, if you can override the first amendment, you can override the fourth amendment. It would be the only case I know of in American law whereby you would be able to, as a matter of principle, in order to get that damning evidence, have a warrantless search.

Mr. President, it could also override the eighth amendment so that we could punish desecration without having met the standard of cruel and unusual punishment. I know this sounds bizarre, but to take this to its logical extreme, anybody who burns the flag, cut their hand off. Well, if it can override the first, it can override the eighth. I do not think any informed legislature in this country, and they are all informed, would ever do that. But arguably, Mr. President, it would be allowed. If you go out and murder someone, or be a serial murderer, hack them up, throw them away, you are still protected by the eighth amendment from cruel and unusual punishment. But if you burn the flag, you lose your hand. I am not saying any legislature would do that, but think of the uncharted waters we are entering the way this amendment is drafted. It could override the 14th amendment to define desecration so that it is only legal for whites to use the flag and no one else. There is no place in American history for that anymore.

Does anyone doubt 20 years from now or 40 years from now or 80 years from now, there could not be a legislature in this country that would allow that to happen? This would allow that. I do not expect it to happen, but I do not think we can act lightly, Mr. President. When we are amending the Constitution of the United States of America, we should know what we are doing. Although at this time and place, with an enlightened public, none of these crazy things might come to pass, what about 50 years from now, 100 years from now?

I am talking about a document we all revere that has a couple hundred years on it and hopefully will have a couple thousand years on it before it is no longer operative. We are not passing this for next week or next month or next year. We are passing it for my great-great-great-grandchildren.

Mr. President, we just had a bill on the floor of the Senate to recompense Japanese-American citizens for being put in relocation camps in World War II, nothing we are all particularly proud of today. Looking back in history, one can explain how it happened, not condone but explain.

What kind of conditions are going to sit out there 1 year or 5 or 7 or 10 years from now? We cannot think that what we are writing will be applied only in a way that we intend it at this moment. The Chair knows better than anyone else in this body that in interpreting constitutional law the document is what is looked at. If it is clear on its face, then it does not matter what the Senator from Delaware or the Senators from any other State thought it meant when he voted for it.

Does anyone really want to send an amendment to the States that could allow such laws or could be legally argued to have overridden the rest of the Constitution if a State chose to do it? Because to reiterate the point, Mr. President, if it can, without explicitly stating so, override the first amendment, which is the objective to get at Texas versus Johnson, then tell me, anyone, how it would not just as legally override the other amendments even though that is not the intention and even though that is probably not how it would be applied at least today, tomorrow, next year, 2 years, 10 years from now.

Mr. President, for the sake of argument, I am willing to assume that the amendment can do what the administration wants it to do. For the sake of argument, let us assume that this amendment does not do violence to the first amendment, both of which I disagree with but for the sake of argument to make my next point, all that does is get us to the fifth myth, the myth that we know the kinds of laws the States will pass because physical desecration is easy to define and because, as Mr. Barr, the administration's witness put it, a ban on desecration is particularly well suited for preserving the symbolic value of the flag.

Let me ask this of those who believe that physical desecration is easy to define and well suited to protect the flag. I am not being facetious when I ask these questions. Is it physical desecration of the flag to depict the flag on hotdog wrappers, paper cups, or other commercial products? Is that physical desecration of the flag? Is it physical desecration, as I said, to fly a giant flag over a foreign-car dealership? Is it physical desecration to place a flag on a pair of boots similar to those the President gave the leader of China? Boots, after all, have been the symbol of repression.

Is it physical desecration to allow a fanatical white supremacist group to fly the flag at one of its camps in the northwestern woods while they take target practice at images of blacks, Jews, and Hispanic children? Is it physical desecration of the flag to let the Aryan Nation wear the flag on their uniforms? To me it is. This is as much desecration as somebody walking on that flag—these people are animals—but maybe it is not to somebody else.

Is it physical desecration for the hate-filled Nazis, the American Nazi Party, as they goosestep through Skokie, IL, a predominantly Jewish neighborhood with a number of concentration camp survivors, to fly the flag next to the swastika at the head of their parade? Where I come from that is desecration. And every fiber in my being says that is desecration, for they stand for everything the flag is in place to keep from happening.

Is it physical desecration for the Ku Klux Klan to embroider the flag on their dunce caps, whatever you call those pointed things that they wear on their heads, or is it physical desecration for the Ku Klux Klan as they meet and have their rallies to have the American flag embroidered on their silk pajamas?

Is it physical desecration for them to do that while they are burning crosses, telling folks like me who are Catholic, it is not a good idea to be around here, or blacks, that we are really not equal? Where I come from, you get my family to vote on that one being physical desecration.

Is it physical desecration for the Subaru car company to paint the American flag on their cars as they drive up the top of the mountain advertising sponsorship of the American Olympic ski team? That always bothers me, by the way. I do not mean that in the national sense, but the American ski team sponsored by Subaru is somehow inaccurate anyway.

Does anyone doubt that if this amendment passes, a State legislative body might not pass a law defining any one of the acts that I have mentioned as physical desecration? I would like to be the manager of the bill in the State legislature when one of our colleagues would introduce a bill saying the American Nazi Party cannot fly the flag for it is physical desecration and see who votes against it. Talk about a litmus test vote, that would be a good one, would it not. You would be able to do a lot of mailings off of that one.

Does everybody think no one is going to do that in any State legislative body? Or maybe we do want to make that desecration of the flag. Maybe that is what we are trying to do. Maybe that is what this amendment is intended to do. If it is, let us say so.

We just do not know what sort of wild card phrase we are writing into the Constitution with these words "physical desecration."

There is a sixth myth, Mr. President, that is related to the one I just discussed, the myth that legislators, in Mr. Barr's words "would have the power under the amendment that they had prior to June 21 so that there is nothing new." That argument will be heard and made in a very articulate manner by one of my colleagues who is on the floor at this moment, the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY]. He and others believe that and will so state.

If we pass this constitutional amendment, we are doing nothing but putting things back to the way they used to be.

Mr. President, it is not the status quo that we will be passing. Mr. Barr also testified that if this amendment were adopted, the States would "have wide latitude" to prohibit conduct toward the flag, that they would be "permitted and obliged to draw a line," and that they would have "substantial discretion" in fashioning flag-owners.

How will the State use this wide latitude and a substantial discretion? Might the State of Michigan use its wide latitude and substantial discretion to prohibit Toyota, Honda, and other foreign car makers from using the flag in any advertisements on the grounds that they are implying that it was made in America or it had something to do with American ingenuity? Might the State of Georgia or the State of Florida use its wide latitude and substantial discretion to prohibit American Airlines from using flags on their airlines in an effort to help Eastern Airlines who employs tens of thousands of workers in their States?

We have all been in legislative bodies a long time. Screwy things happen. I wonder what would have happened in the State of Iowa 5 years ago during the serious farm crisis they were having when John Deere was shutting down plant after plant and Japanese-made and German-made farm equipment was being brought into the State. I wonder what would have happened if the State legislature passed a law, introduced a law saying none of the foreign farm implement dealers can use the American flag in any of their advertisements. I would like to see the guy who voted against it when tens of thousands of folks in the State of Iowa directly and indirectly associated with John Deere and other major farm implement manufacturers were going out of business.

Might the State of Vermont use its wide latitude and substantial discretion to prohibit the Socialist Party from using the flag because it has decided that it does not want any more Socialist mayors?

Up until last year, Mr. President, the only freely elected Socialist, avowed Socialist, member of the Socialist Party who was elected was elected in the State of Vermont.

It is beyond question that the State of Vermont or similar States could pass a law saying the Socialist Party could not in any way fly the American flag? I see the Senator from Vermont is here. I know he knows his constituency is much too enlightened for that but how about in 10, 20, 30, 40 years?

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield at that point without losing his right to the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. BIDEN. I am happy to yield for that purpose.

Mr. LEAHY. I might note the Socialist mayor referred to always flew the flag at meetings of the city council, meetings of the mayor, and so forth. It does not apply to all Americans no matter what our particular political beliefs might be. The city council in that city represents the diversity of the city, ranging from extremely conservative Republicans to liberal Republicans, extremely conservative Democrats to liberal Democrats, and members of the mayor's own party.

I cannot imagine any one of them ever standing for any law that would say that some could and some could not fly the American flag as Americans because every single one of them wanted to fly it, and every single one of them while they used to disagree totally on most issues would unite on the one—that they each had the right to fly it.

I yield back to my friend from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. I thank my colleague.

I realize I have spoken much longer than I ordinarily do, and I will speak about another 10 minutes. I see other colleagues who would like to speak.

I do so because I feel so strongly about the Constitution. I feel so certain that although we can pass the proper amendment, this is the wrong amendment, and will do things no one intends it to do other than the stated case made by the administration.

There is a seventh myth, Mr. President, associated with defining the flag of the United States which the statute uses. The administration is just as confident in the State's ability to define the flag as their ability to define physical desecration.

The legislation that will become law in 8 days narrows—this is not the constitutional amendment, the legislation we have already passed, and in 10 days because it went to the President's desk today and he announced he would let it become law—in 10 days when it becomes law narrows the definition of the flag to that which is commonly displayed.

According to the administration, however, under the proposed amendments, States could adopt virtually any definition of the flag which would allow them and in Mr. Barr's words to "protect depictions of the flag" such as posters, murals, pictures, buttons, and any other representation they wished to protect or prohibit from protection.

Mr. President, if that is the case, the legislature could make it illegal to crumble a paper cut with the representation of the flag on it, make it illegal to spill coffee on a paper placemat in a restaurant which has a picture of the flag on it, make it illegal to throw out buttons that have the representation of the flag on it, make it illegal to scrape a sticker off a car that has a depiction of the flag on it, make it illegal to cut a birthday cake that has a representation of the flag on it, or conversely, make it illegal to allow depiction of the flag on any of those things.

I do not know how many times I have heard people say they think it is unseemly for advertisers to use the flag the way they do for crass commercial purposes. Well, the fact is that defining the flag will not be easy, and some States could well decide to include things that none of us ever thought of as the flag.

Mr. President, the eighth and last myth I will talk about now is that the amendment is necessary because only it will end the litigation on the subject.

I heard some say when I introduced my statute, "Well, look. Even if you are right, BIDEN, and you can protect the flag and it is constitutional to do it by statute, you are going to generate so much litigation about that law." This myth says that the amendment is a preferred way, preferred to the statute, because the statute will cause lawsuits over its constitutionality while the amendment will not.

Mr. President, the truth is precisely the opposite. When one thinks about it, it is the amendment that will stimulate a generation of litigation. It will create and these are Prof. Walter Dellinger's words "an entirely new jurisprudence of the 27th amendment."

Just imagine the kind of litigation we might have with potentially 50 different State definitions of physical desecration and 50 different definitions of what constitutes a flag.

What if the State of Maryland defines physical desecration and the flag to include representations of the flag on clothing but the District of Columbia does not.

Does a woman traveling from Delaware to a gala in Washington who chooses to wear a sequined dress that she has purchased for several thousand dollars with a representation of the flag embroidered on it have to first check the State law before she gets in the car? Should she change out of her dress as she crosses the Maryland line and change back into it as she reaches Washington, or should she keep the dress and hope she is not stopped and run the risk of being dragged into court?

Can one State decide that it is obscene to wear a bikini with the stars across the top, and the stripes on the bottom, while others do not? If Mississippi says it is, and California says it is not, can you be arrested for sending a bathing suit like that from Biloxi to Berkeley, or is that interstate transportation of an illegal material?

By the way, Mr. President, I am not making these up. There are bathing suits women buy now that have the flag on them. I can take you—I cannot take you. I am sure I can find someone who will take you to various department stores and bathing suit stores.

Let us assume they are on the beach and a woman is wearing an extremely revealing bathing suit that has the flag on it. A local legislative body can conclude that is obscene, the flag should not be able to be worn that way, and yet it can be all right for a matron wearing a size 40, full length, old-fashioned bathing suit with the flag on it.

What are we getting ourselves into here? Could there be litigation over whether draping the flag over Mother Liberty constitutes physical desecration of the flag? Or, as was pointed out in the House hearing, when a Member of Congress draped the flag over her body to have her photograph taken for a magazine, is that physical desecration of the flag?

I see the smile on Members' faces. When that was raised before, some said it depends on the politics of the person over whom the flag is draped. That is probably true, by the way. To think that you are not going to have litigation based on this, if the State of Delaware determines that it is improper to use the flag for crass commercial reasons and the State of Pennsylvania does not? Where did you advertise your product?

Ironically, Mr. President, we are doing exactly the opposite of what I think most Members want done. Why is it that we usually pass constitutional amendments? I respectfully suggest the reason we do is to ensure that we have uniformity throughout the Nation. That is the primary reason, Mr. President—so that you cannot prohibit speech in Wilmington, DE, any more than you can in Sacramento, CA; so that you can impose a tax in New York City as well as Biloxi, MS; so that you can protect the rights of black people in Flint, MI, as well as Decatur.

Mr. President, that is usually the reason why we pass constitutional amendments. Is it not kind of strange; here we are passing a constitutional amendment in the name of having a uniform standard to protect that flag. That is the reason for constitutional amendments; we want to protect the flag.

Mr. President, by definition, we are saying we are lucky to have 50 different standards, 50 different laws, defining in 50 different ways what constitutes desecration. If that is the case, why do we need a constitutional amendment? If we are going to protect the flag, Mr. President, for Lord's sake, let us protect the flag. I do not want an uninformed legislature in any part of the country, as well as informed one, passing a law that allows that flag to be burned or destroyed, for any reason.

So, Mr. President, if we want a statute to the constitutional amendment, it should say here is the standard; the amendment says you cannot burn the flag under these circumstances, bang, bang, bang, bang, bang, and make it a national standard. Why is it any less reprehensible to burn a flag in Louisiana than it is in Montana, or in Delaware than it is in the State of Washington? If it is wrong, it is wrong. That is what the Constitution is for. Those are broad principles.

Mr. President, I do not know the answers to all the questions I have raised. I guess the States can make those judgments, and we can say, "See you in court." But if we want litigation, Mr. President, I will bet my colleagues anything that passage of this amendment, if it becomes the 27th amendment, will spur more court cases than anything that we have done to the Constitution. It almost guarantees it, Mr. President. I do not want litigation; I want protection.

Mr. President, what it boils down to is this: In an effort to unify the country, to rally us around a national symbol that reflects who we are and embodies we the people, this proposed amendment does exactly the opposite; it leaves up to 50 State legislatures to decide whether they can protect the flag, knowing that they think they can go far beyond what they were able to do before, and if they do, how to protect them. It will spawn years of litigation trying to determine what all this means and why, and it does this when we have already passed a law that does it all and does all we said we wanted to do, what all of us in this Chamber want to do, to protect the flag. I believe the flag is worth protecting, because it symbolizes the bond we all share, a bond that unites us as members of one community.

America is, more than any other nation on Earth, the land of heterogeneous people. They are made up of all different races, backgrounds, and all different religions. The genius of the American system is that it takes this heterogeneity, which in other countries and other systems is a great weakness, and turns it into a strong ally; America forges strength out of the heterogeneous society, and it is not easy.

Mr. President, we are taught in school that because we are different, we are strong. The honest-to-goodness truth is because we are different, we fear one another. The fact that we are black and white does not send us running to one another, embraced to herald our differences. The fact that we are Christian and Jew does not have us each singing the praises of the other. The fact is that people fear that which is different.

But the brilliance of this Nation has been that we have allowed ourselves to be the most diverse democracy in the history of mankind, in spite of the fact that human nature fears that which is different, because we have made a covenant; we have all said that the Constitution as a document will be the means by which we will all agree to seek to realize our aspirations and our dreams. It is that document that binds us together.

If France tomorrow reverted to a monarchy, France would not change, Mr. President. You define a Frenchman based on his ethnicity, as with a German and an Italian. But how do you define an American? How can you define who an American is? In no other way than in political terms, the forum of government to which we subscribe.

That flag is the symbol of that government. That is why those who have criticized me for wanting to protect the flag legislatively say, well, the Germans do not protect their flag, or the British, and so on. They do not need it like we do, Mr. President. There is an ethnicity that binds them together. People who are different, people who are fundamentally different need symbols, as well as substance, to bind them. That cloth is binding and warrants being protected.

Mr. President, this amendment will not do that. This amendment will not overturn Texas versus Johnson. This amendment will not do anything other than fray the document that that flag embodies, by allowing for the first time in our history an explicit amendment to the Constitution's first amendment, and Lord only knows how many others.

Mr. President, I submit that we will in 10 days as a matter of law in this Nation binding all Americans, in all 50 States, in the entire country, have one standard, and it says, "Do not burn me or you go to jail; that is the law." And in 10 days it will be the law and it is constitutional, at least the vast majority of both Houses of this Congress thought so and the President thought so or otherwise he would be, as a matter of conscience, required to have vetoed it.

So why are we doing this unless it is to go beyond protecting the flag and attempting to amend the first amendment?

Mr. President, if protecting your flag is your concern, and I know it is of all Members of this Chamber, if that is what is at issue we have a law making it illegal to defile the flag.

Mr. President, let us assume the Senator from Delaware and the President of the United States and others are wrong and that it turns out to be an unconstitutional law. That is the time to come back here forthwith and draft an amendment, but this time draft an amendment that is precise, and draft an amendment that makes it illegal to burn the flag without doing violence to the rest of the Constitution and that sets a national standard rather than a hodgepodge of 50 different laws generated and spawning thousands, over time, pieces of litigation.

I thank my colleagues for their indulgence. I have much to say on this when the debate ensues, but I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). The Chair recognizes the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY].

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise in support of the proposed constitutional amendment, and I do it because it will take a constitutional amendment to protect the physical integrity of the flag of the United States.

This constitutional amendment before us is the only responsible means to change the result of Texas versus Johnson.

It is the only solution for those who think that there is a crime when someone mutilates, defaces, burns, or tramples upon the flag.

It is the answer for those who think that what Gregory Johnson did to the flag—not his verbal utterance—was not protected by the Constitution.

After Texas versus Johnson, I am convinced that the only response to the Supreme Court's decision is to amend the Constitution.

Mr. President, we did recently enact H.R. 2978, the so-called flag protection statute. It prohibits the mutilation, defacing, physically defiling, burning, maintaining on the ground or floor, or trampling upon the flag in all cases except to allow disposal of old or worn flags.

The President has apparently decided to allow the bill to become law without his signature. I wish that he had vetoed it.

I understand that the enactment of H.R. 2978 will lead many of my colleagues to presume that we have solved the problem of flag burning in the United States. My colleagues will think that there is no longer a need for a constitutional amendment, that somehow we have done all that needs to be done through the passage of that statute.

This view, Mr. President, is wrong. In my judgment it is profoundly wrong.

I start from the proposition that to protect the flag from physical desecration in no way impairs, restricts, or diminishes the first amendment principle of freedom of speech. On this point, I am at odds with the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee who just spoke, and who raises all sorts of possibilities that that might be the case.

Protecting the flag from physical desecration does not prevent a single idea and/or thought from being expressed. It does not interfere with the numerous ways of communicating an idea. Rather, it merely prevents conduct with respect to one object and one subject alone: our flag.

We can withdraw that one subject from the threat of physical desecration without limiting freedom of speech. For many years, a Federal statute and the laws of 48 States did protect the flag from physical desecration.

Who here can say that any harm was done to the first amendment from any of those 48 State statutes or our Federal statute?

For all these many years were we less free to express ourselves? Of course not.

Our committee hearings and recent events have reinforced my belief that we are obliged to respond to the Supreme Court, and I want you to know, Mr. President, that I do not take such a responsibility lightly.

The hearings held by our committee have convinced me that a statute such as H.R. 2978, will not survive a legal challenge, nor does a statute have the certainty of a constitutional amendment.

As described by my statement opposing H.R. 2978 about 10 days ago, the Judiciary Committee hearings convinced me that there is sufficient disagreement with the effects of H.R. 2978 to leave in doubt its constitutionality.

Specifically, I do not believe the contention that the statute is content-neutral.

As I stated to my colleagues previously, the majority opinion in Johnson clearly states that allowing some types of conduct with the flag, while proscribing other conduct, would not be constitutional.

Quoting from the majority opinion:

> If we were to hold that a State may forbid flag-burning wherever it is likely to endanger the flag's symbolic role, but allow it wherever burning a flag * * * promotes that role * * * we would be saying that * * * the flag itself may be used as a symbol * * * only in one direction. We never before have held that the Government may ensure that a symbol may be used to express only one view of that symbol * * *.

Finally, I am uncomfortable with attempting to overturn a Supreme Court decision, which is grounded in the Constitution, by the passage of a mere statute. We have had some very persuasive testimony on that point.

So, I prefer the proposed constitutional amendment.

Senate Joint Resolution 180 provides for the following amendment to the Constitution: "Congress and the States shall have power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag of the United States."

I believe that adoption of this amendment will return the law to its status before the Texas versus Johnson decision and restore the power to Congress and the States to prohibit flag desecration, which I believe is a power they always had.

I believe it does that and nothing more.

In Johnson, the Court said it could not pick and choose which symbols were so unique as to warrant protection. The Court said:

> There is, moreover, no indication—either in the text of the Constitution or in our cases interpreting it—that a separate juridical category exists for the American flag alone.

This amendment establishes just such a category in the Constitution's text.

To those critics who maintain that any amendment that attempts to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag tinkers or tampers with the first amendment, or seeks to overturn protections inherent in the first amendment by restricting its free speech guarantee, I say that those people are missing the point.

A significant number of respected constitutional law scholars testified before the Judiciary Committee that this constitutional amendment does not replace the language or the principles of the first amendment; it does not amend that amendment; it does not tinker or tamper with it.

It simply overturns a Supreme Court decision that incorrectly interpreted that amendment.

In addition, Senate Joint Resolution 180 does not "trump" other portions of the Constitution, such as the cruel and unusual clause of the eighth amendment, or the prohibition against unreasonable searches or seizures in the fourth amendment.

There is no power in this proposed constitutional amendment to trump anything.

The only power in the constitutional amendment before us is the power to prohibit the physical desecration of the flag—period.

Let me say this as plainly as can be: Nothing in the language of Senate Joint Resolution 180 or in the intentions of its sponsors give power to Congress or the States to override any other provision of the Constitution.

A good example of the truth of this position is provided by the 16th amendment, which conveys upon Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes on income, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration."

Phrased in the same style as this proposed constitutional amendment, the 16th amendment has not brought about the dire consequences that critics are now ascribing to Senate Joint Resolution 180.

The power to tax incomes is pervasive. Yet, the 16th amendment has not trumped the 8th amendment. The right to a speedy trial under the sixth amendment is applicable to a tax prosecution. In short, the 16th amendment has certainly not trumped other protections existing elsewhere in the Constitution.

While interesting as an academic exercise, I do not view these criticisms as having any practical concern.

And while I appreciate the concern that Congress should not act in haste by amending the Constitution, nothing the Congress does regarding an amendment to the Constitution is automatic or pro forma.

By very thoughtful and intentional design, the passage of an amendment by two-thirds of both the House and the Senate signals only the beginning of the process—one that is cumbersome at best.

As we all know, the States must have their opportunity to speak to the issue through the ratification process. Only upon the positive affirmation of three-fourths of the State legislatures does an amendment become a part of the Constitution.

That is how it should be; and thankfully, that is how it is.

I know many of my colleagues fear the effect that a flag protection amendment might—in theory—have on some first amendment rights.

And of course we must be serious and thoughtful in our deliberations about a change in the Constitution. But remember, that great document is now inviolate. The Founding Fathers—to their credit—provided for amendments, albeit through a most cumbersome process—and properly so.

Indeed, a number of the amendments are a direct response to Supreme Court decisions. These include the 11th amendment, prohibiting the exercise of Federal judicial power over a case brought by a citizen of one State against another State; the 13th amendment, abolishing slavery in the United States; the 14th amendment, granting the former slaves citizenship and all rights and privileges pertaining thereto; and the 16th amendment, establishing the Federal income tax.

On thoughtful reflection, I will vote for the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 180 because a constitutional amendment is the only real solution to restore the law to the status quo prior to the Supreme Court's June 1989 decision in Texas versus Johnson.

I do not believe that it will lead down some slippery slope toward abolition of the first amendment.

Indeed, I believe that without it, we may already be traveling down a path that will make indistinguishable the difference between liberty and license.

I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I oppose the pending constitutional amendment to authorize Congress and the States to ban physical desecration of the flag.

The issue before us today is not whether Senators are for the flag or against the flag.

All Senators—and all but the tiniest handful of Americans—cherish the flag as the symbol of our Nation and the freedoms we enjoy. All of us condemn flag burning, because the act of desecrating the flag casts contempt on our country, our heritage, and our history.

We honor the flag, not for its design or its colors or its fabric; we honor the flag because of what it stands for—the ideals of liberty that are written in the Constitution and enshrined in the hearts of generations of Americans.

Those who gathered in Philadelphia in 1787 to draft the Constitution were some of the finest minds the world has ever known. But they left Philadelphia that summer knowing that the Constitution they had prepared was incomplete, because it lacked specific protections for the fundamental freedoms essential to guarantee liberty.

And so, as a condition for acceptance of the Constitution, a Bill of Rights would also be submitted to the States and ratified as part of the Constitution. For two centuries, the Constitution and Bill of Rights have served as the enduring charter of our liberties, a model for freedom-loving peoples throughout the world.

And for two centuries, nothing—not a bitterly divisive civil war, not a shattering depression, none of the other dramatic changes that have transformed the Nation from a cluster of quarreling colonies to the world power it is today—has caused America to amend the Bill of Rights.

Yet now, we are being asked to do so—partly because of concern over the obnoxious act of a protester who burned the flag, but largely because of an unseemly effort to gain partisan political advantage from the incident.

There can be no doubt that Gregory Lee Johnson committed a despicable act. He burned the flag at the 1984 Republican Convention to express his anger at President Reagan. But Johnson was not prosecuted for starting a fire, or inciting a riot. He was prosecuted under a Texas statute which made it a crime to mistreat the flag in a way that would seriously offend others. Johnson was prosecuted because he used the flag to express his point of view.

The Supreme Court ruled that the Constitution prohibited the State of Texas from prosecuting Johnson for his protest. Justice Brennan said:

> We do not consecrate the flag by punishing its desecration, for in doing so we dilute the freedom that this cherished emblem represents.

As Justice Kennedy stated in his concurring opinion:

> It is poignant but fundamental that the flag protects those who hold it in contempt.

Johnson's actions were deplorable, and the Court's decision that he must go free generated an initial firestorm of public outrage, which ignited this unwise effort to amend the Constitution. But the Court's ruling shows a deep understanding of the true meaning of the Constitution; and with the passage of time, millions of Americans have indicated that they are unwilling to tamper with the Constitution in order to outlaw a particular form of dissent.

The public pressure for a constitutional amendment has subsided—but the partisan pressure has not.

President Bush's initial instinct was to acquiesce in the Supreme Court's decision and defend the Court for protecting the freedom of speech guaranteed by the Constitution.

He could have said nothing more, and watched the public clamor settle down. Instead, after lunch with Lee Atwater, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, the President launched a campaign to enact a constitutional amendment to overrule the Court's decision.

As a Presidential candidate, President Bush had waged a partisan political campaign around the flag during the election of 1988. But it is a very different thing for President Bush, as President of all the people, to use his high office to wage a similarly partisan and similarly political campaign around the flag in 1989.

The Atwater-Bush amendment will do more violence to the Constitution than Gregory Lee Johnson could possibly have hoped to accomplish by his puny act of protest. For the first time in 200 years, an amendment would be enacted that creates an exception to the guarantee of freedom of speech protected by the Constitution.

It is wrong to desecrate the Constitution to prevent desecration of the flag. We do not respect the flag—indeed, we disrespect the flag—when we diminish the freedoms for which it stands.

No constitutional freedom is more central to our democratic tradition than freedom of speech.

The concept of free and open debate is the cornerstone of our democracy. If the Government can censor its critics, then the ideal of free debate becomes an empty promise.

The words of the first amendment are simple and majestic:

> Congress shall make no law * * * abridging freedom of speech.

The Atwater-Bush amendment would undermine that fundamental liberty. For the first time in our 200-year history, it would create an exception to the freedom of speech our Constitution protects.

Enacting that exception would irreparably damage our remaining liberties.

Thoughout our history, freedom of expression has rested on the idea that the Constitution requires us to tolerate opposing viewpoints—not just those we approve, but those we despise as well. That tolerance is a fundamental part of our American creed. We proudly teach it to our children; it is perhaps the most distinctly American virtue.

The proposed constitutional amendment would end that broad tolerance. Freedom of speech would protect all of us, except those who burn the flag in protest. If we adopt such an amendment, and made an exception to the first amendment because of our concern over a single act of flag burning, what will we say the next time the majority is offended by some other form of protest?

Must other offensive views be tolerated, once we have adopted an exception to the first amendment to protect others' sensibilities on the flag? If we yield to the temptation to stifle unpopular, offensive views today, there is no fair way to draw the line against other offensive views tomorrow.

For these reasons, I oppose any effort to amend the Constitution to outlaw flag desecration. Nevertheless, the administration's proposed constitutional amendment is particularly flawed.

The amendment provides that governments may prohibit—physical desecration of the flag—but the enacting resolution indicates that the amendment would authorize governments to prohibit any display of the flag in a contemptuous manner.

During the Judiciary Committee hearings on the proposed amendment, it became clear that the amendment could be used to stifle use of the flag to communicate any message. The administration's witness embraced the Black's Law Dictionary definition of desecration, which includes "to put to an unworthy use."

Thus, a State legislature could outlaw any use of the flag that a majority of its members find unworthy. For example, the amendment would authorize a legislature to bar the use of the flag in the advertisements of a particular political party. It could even be used to prevent the flag from being carried at the head of a protest march, if a city council concluded that doing so would constitute a contemptuous display of the flag.

Worse, the proposed amendment does not indicate which constitutional provisions it would amend. Indeed, the fact that the proposal would not explicitly limit the first amendment prompted several witnesses, including one testifying in favor of the amendment, to conclude that the proposal would not change the outcome of the Johnson case at all.

But the amendment could just as easily be read as eliminating all constitutional restrictions on flag desecration laws, so that any of the 50 State legislatures, or the more than 7,000 city and county councils, could pass laws barring particular groups from carrying the flag, or authorizing the police to conduct midnight warrantless searches for mistreated flags or to imprison flag desecrators without a trial.

Once a constitutional amendment is proposed by the Congress, it is forever out of our hands. Once an amendment is ratified, it becomes part of our national charter for all time. We ought not to place in the Constitution an amendment restricting our fundamental freedoms, when no one can say with certainty just what that amendment means.

Finally, it is preposterous for those who believe that some response to the Johnson decision is required to tamper with the Constitution to protect the flag, when a statute may well be all that is necessary to achieve their goal.

Nothing more clearly demonstrates the partisan political nature of this debate than the insistence of the Atwater-Bush flag brigade that only a constitutional amendment can accomplish their objective. There will be time enough for Congress to consider such an amendment in the future, after the Supreme Court has ruled on the constitutionality of the flag protection statute now awaiting action by the President. Surely, it is unseemly for Congress to rush to amend the Constitution, when enactment of legislation can do the job.

The proposed constitutional amendment will not bring flag burning to an end. Love of country cannot be legislated; it springs from affection for the democratic principles, the free traditions, and the generous and noble character that are uniquely American.

As Justice Brennan wrote:

> [T]he way to preserve the flag's special role is not to punish those who feel differently about these matters. It is to persuade them that they are wrong.

We respect the flag most—and protect it best—when we honor the freedoms for which it stands.

I urge my colleagues to reject the proposed constitutional amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY].

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I understand there has been a great deal of debate on this this afternoon. I was going to speak at some length this afternoon, but there are a number of other Senators who have had a chance to speak, and I understand we will also address this issue tomorrow. Tomorrow afternoon, beginning at 2 or 2:30, we will turn to Nicaragua.

So, I am not going to speak on this issue this evening. I might ask my good friend from South Carolina if he is going to speak on this matter this afternoon? Because, if he is not, I would suggest the absence of a quorum. The leadership may want to go into morning business and wrap up things here today.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in response to the question of the able Senator, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER] is coming over to speak this afternoon. I spoke once. I will not speak any more today. But the Senator is welcome to speak.

I think we ought to get along with it. I am not going to make any long speeches.

Mr. LEAHY. I might tell my friend from South Carolina I was trying to get some idea of the schedule. I find everybody is asking me what the schedule is going to be this afternoon. I am like the passenger on the train. They are not really letting me run it. They might let me toot the whistle now and then, but they are not letting me run it.

Mr. THURMOND. This is a very important subject. I am sure a great many Senators wish to express themselves, but I think they will make brief statements to be on record on the question.

I suggest the Senator go ahead and speak if he wants to speak.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator is going to make a statement. If he is not, I will introduce a bill on habeas corpus for a few minutes.

Mr. LEAHY. As the distinguished Senator from South Carolina knows, this is a matter of considerable importance to me. Since I will be here anyway, I wish to leave room for others who wish to speak now. I will be on the floor for several days on this and will speak a number of times. If the Senator from South Carolina wishes to introduce legislation or to speak on something else, of course, I will not interfere with that at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. THURMOND pertaining to the introduction of S. 1760 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I want to speak briefly on the pending legislation. I have spoken before—as a matter of fact, I believe the Senator from Virginia was presiding when the flag issue came up before—and I indicated at that point I felt it would be a great mistake to amend the Constitution.

Every time there is an unpopular court decision, there is a rush to say let us solve this by amending the Constitution. Fortunately, in most cases, we have resisted the temptation.

Back some time ago, prior to the time of the Senator from Virginia, my time, and Senator LEAHY's time, there was an unpopular decision of a court on the question of polygamy, and we came very close to having a constitutional amendment to outlaw polygamy. Fortunately, we did not trivialize the Constitution at that time. My hope is we will now do the same.

I have great respect for the flag. We have a flag flying from our home on a flagpole in deep southern Illinois. We are proud to have that flag flying. It means a great deal to us.

I attended a concert Saturday night in Chicago, of all things, of the Red Army Chorus, and the final number of that concert—these are people in Soviet uniforms, with a flag in the background—was "God Bless America." I have to tell you, it was a moving experience in view of all the relationships we have had with the Soviet Union.

I have great respect for the flag, but I also have great respect for the Constitution.

We ought to be very careful and cautious indeed before we amend the Constitution. If there are sweeping things of major importance to the future of the Nation—I will give you an example; that is, the proposal to amend the Constitution to require that we have a balanced budget unless there is a 60 percent vote of Congress to the contrary.

There you are dealing with something that is very sweeping. There I think whatever our opinion, we are dealing with fundamental policy.

Here we are dealing with one person in Texas burning the flag and the Supreme Court in a 5 to 4 decision that did not even invalidate the Texas statute in unusual circumstances. The Court said that was not a violation of the Constitution; that he could burn the flag under freedom of speech.

I disagree with that decision. The all-time champion of freedom of speech in the history of the U.S. Supreme Court, Justice Hugo Black—I wish I could have had the opportunity to meet him, to know him—even believed the liable laws were unconstitutional, and fortunately his view did not prevail. I do not know what we would be reading if his view prevailed. But even Justice Hugo Black said freedom of speech does not include burning the flag. I think he was right.

I think a properly crafted statute could reverse that court decision. We passed the statute. I am sure we will work out whatever minor details remain with the House on that. We will get a bill to the President. The President has already indicated he is not going to veto it.

Let us let that remain for awhile to see what the court says about the statute. But let us not rush to amend the Constitution. Let us hold high and revere the Constitution, and amend it only if there is a great national need. That great national need is not here on this issue, and I hope, Mr. President, that we will not move in that direction.

Unless someone else wishes to have the floor, I see my colleague from Vermont is about to take the floor. I yield the floor.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY].

Mr. LEAHY. I wish to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Illinois for his speech. I totally agree with the points he has made. As I said, I will speak further on this subject a little later on. Certainly the statute before the President now shall pass the test of constitutionality.

I sat through much of those hearings, listened to the constitutional lawyers who spoke about it; distinguished lawyers, distinguished scholars, distinguished constitutional analysts, and they testified that it will pass the muster of constitutionality. I am convinced of it.

I am convinced also that is the way it should go, not to touch the Bill of Rights. After all, the Bill of Rights has survived 200 years. It has never been amended.

We have had world wars, a great Civil War, Presidential assassinations, great depressions, expansion of this country, and slavery, and throughout all of those times the United States resisted the temptation to amend the Bill of Rights. Now we are asked to amend the Bill of Rights because of the publicity-seeking action of one jerk before the cameras in Texas. We are now asked to amend the Bill of Rights.

We did not amend it during world wars, we did not amend it during the depressions, Presidential assassinations, the Civil War, expansion of the West, and all of the other matters facing the Nation. But we will do it because of a 10 second act in front of the television cameras by some publicity seeker?

Mr. President, none of us would be able to stand up and say we are truly the conscience of the Nation, of this body, if we allowed that to happen.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Illinois jogged my memory when he mentioned Justice Hugo Black. While we are waiting for the majority and minority leaders to come to the Chamber, I will recollect the time I met Hugo Black.

I was a young law student at Georgetown. We had invited, because of an event going on, most members of the Supreme Court as our guests. We received a call back saying that they would come but not if there was a head table. They wanted to sit at individual tables with the law students.

You can imagine the thrill of those of us in law school who heard this. We drew our names, by lot, to determine who we would sit with. I was a member of the student government, and my name never came up that way, but I ended up sitting next to Hugo Black, who had long been a hero of mine; and he invited my wife, who was then a nurse at the VA hospital here in Washington, putting me through law school, to come and join me.

It was a most remarkable luncheon. Justice Black, as we stepped aside and let him precede us into the dining room, took my wife by the arm and said with such cordial southern courtesy, "Please, go ahead of us, my dear." He told the law students, all of whom were male in that day, that none of us could lend the dignity and charm to the table that she could, and went from there.

When he heard I was from Vermont, he talked about the famous saying, "As goes Maine, so goes Vermont," that was heard right after the Roosevelt landslide. Before that, Maine, which always voted first, used to indicate which way the country would go in elections, and they would say, "As Maine goes, so goes the Nation." Well, during the Roosevelt landslide, President Roosevelt carried all but two States, Maine, and my own State of Vermont. We have a tradition in Vermont as being the most Republican State in the Union.

I had mentioned that saying, "As Maine goes, so goes Vermont," attributed to, I believe, former Postmaster General James Farley. Justice Black said, "That Farley takes credit for that, but that was my saying. I was sitting there having a drink with Franklin" and I realized that he meant President Roosevelt "and he heard the results coming in, and I turned to him and said, 'as Maine goes, so goes Vermont.'" And Justice Black said, "that Jim Farley ran right out and claimed that as his own."

We got into further discussions of Vermont, and he told me he was coming up to campaign in Vermont for one of our losing Democratic candidates for the Senate. All Democratic candidates have lost in Vermont, with the exception of myself, and that is purely because they have changed enough now that they want to show some tolerance by allowing at least one token Democrat to come in; and I do appreciate that, as far as I am the token. He talked about going up and campaigning, because Democrats were always trying to put up someone good.

He told me about a campaign almost 30 years before in Burlington-Winooski—and I mention this because Justice Black had no idea who was going to sit at the table; none of us did—but he remembered almost to the vote what the votes had been in that campaign in Vermont. They had gotten a number of other States, but almost 30 years later he remembered almost to the vote.

Then we went on to more serious things, although I would have loved to have heard him tell political stories for the rest of the day. One of the students raised the point about the Constitution. I remember to this day Justice Black reaching in his pocket and pulling out this little dog-eared copy of the Constitution and giving his answer. He flipped it open, and some of the letters had worn off, he had gone through it so many times. He obviously knew it by heart. He said, "Here is where it is." He was going through that Constitution and he said, "You all ought to carry one of those with you every day; do not forget the Constitution," he said. "Do not ever forget the Constitution. That is what guides us, what holds us together." He said, "The Constitution is above everything. Do not ever forget it."

I hope I never have. We have had debate, and we will have debate this week on the flag, and this is what we really come down to. What are we going to remember more, a momentary political poll or the Constitution, which outlasts all polls and outlasts all of us, as it should.

Let us hope that long after we are gone, long after our successors and our successors' successors are gone, the Constitution will endure. Justice Black said at that luncheon that that is above us all. That is really what has to endure. It endures if we keep it simple and strong; it endures if we do not let a passing moment or a passing fancy or a passing concern, or worse yet, a passing political poll, or passing political ad, sway us. We must remember that the Constitution is for the long term. We are but for the short term, all of us. As U.S. Senators and as Members of the House, as Presidents, or Governors, we are for the short term.

The Constitution of this country survives. The Constitution is for the long term. It has to outlive us all, no matter what our political feelings are on this particular issue or any other issue. We must always keep in mind that we serve here because the Constitution makes this body possible. We serve here because the Constitution makes this Government possible. We stand here only for that short time; no matter how many years, it is only a short time, only a moment in history, as compared to the Constitution.

During the time we serve, whatever that period of time is, 6 years, 12 years, or whatever number of years it is, let us remember that the first day we stood in this Senate as U.S. Senators, we took an oath to preserve that Constitution. We took an oath to put that Constitution above ourselves, above our political parties, above our States, above every other interest. That is what we have to remember in this debate.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COATS. Mr. President, the Senate has a traditional constitutional obligation to drag its feet. Not out of indecision, but out of prudence—to ensure we have a Government attentive to the quiet as well as the strident. Madison saw the Senate as a protection "against the transient impressions into which the people might be led." Washington called it "the saucer into which legislation is poured to cool."

But time distinguishes temporary enthusiasm from firm democratic purpose. It has been several months since the Supreme Court's flag decision. We have been through a summer heated by discontent. Now tempers have cooled—but wills have also hardened.

It is evident to me in town meetings. I read it in my mail. But, most of all, I see it in the determination fixed in the faces of veterans. The American flag must be guaranteed respect—even if that takes a constitutional amendment.

These angry men and women are not political activists by nature. But they have been actively provoked. The Court's decision was rooted in an obscene paradox—accusing those who want to protect the flag of debasing the values it embodies, while elevating the actions of a deformed and calloused conscience to the category of protected speech.

When veterans opposed to flag burning stripped away the Court's veneer of sophistry, they found themselves accused of betraying democratic principle—an accusation belied by their sacrifice. They were patronizingly lectured on their deficient respect for the Constitution—an odd lesson, especially for those crippled in its defense. These wounds will not easily heal. And this issue will not easily die.

Some symbols are elevated and ennobled by a unique use and history. We talk of ground hallowed by the blood of patriot soldiers. Or colored cloth set apart from ordinary use to embody the highest hopes of common men. This is our long practice. And it should not be abandoned lightly.

It is my conviction that some men and women have earned the right to see that these symbols are respected by those who benefit from their sacrifice. Protecting the American flag is not required to preserve the Republic—it is not as fragile as that. But it is, I believe, a requirement of conscience—owed as a trust to those we ask to risk death in service of that symbol. This trust is fragile. And by this constitutional amendment, we have a rare opportunity to strengthen it.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, on June 21, 1989, the Supreme Court insulted the American people. With one decision, five men in black robes managed to insult the most precious symbol of our country, the hard won liberties handed down to us by American patriots, and our sense of national pride—the American flag.

Since that dark day in June, a flood of self-annointed legal scholars and self-proclaimed guardians of the Bill of Rights have praised those five justices for their bewildering contribution to political discourse—precisely what we have come to expect of people locked in ivory towers insulated from reality.

But, Mr. President, that is not how the American people feel.

The American people do not need any fancy words or convoluted theories to understand that what the Supreme Court did in June was simply wrong. They instinctively and correctly understand that more than free speech is at stake in this debate. The issue is clear: will each citizen be allowed to decide for himself whether his State or the Federal Government will have the authority to ban the wanton destruction of our most precious symbol?

Mr. President, the American people know that overturning the Supreme Court's decision will do nothing to inhibit anyone's right to free speech. In fact, anyone who has bothered to read the Texas statute knows that Texas did nothing whatsoever to prevent anyone from standing up and saying anything he or she wants to say about this country or its leaders.

I am not a lawyer, but I find it interesting that the concept of informed political speech has been turned on its head by this Court. The Justices declared that flag burning is political expression and hence not to be regulated like shouting "fire" in a crowded theater. Mr. Justice Brennan reached that conclusion because he found it incomprehensible that anyone who saw that malcontent in Texas contemptously burn the American flag, could regard such an action as a personal insult or an invitation to fight.

Perhaps Mr. Justice Brennan would do well to look outside his window on Veterans Day and watch the thousands of outraged men and women who view the Justice's reasoning as incomprehensible. Ask them if burning their flag is an outrage or an invitation to fight. They will set him straight.

The fundamental question remains—and should remain: What is wrong with letting the people decide whether this Nation should protect the honor of the American flag under which so many fought and sacrificed?

Mr. President, the flag of the United States represents the noblest aspirations of our people and the hope of oppressed peoples around the world who look to this country to keep the hope of freedom alive. We have the opportunity to remedy the damage done by the U.S. Supreme Court. Let us proceed this day not merely to enact a statute but to move toward a constitutional amendment to make clear to the Supreme Court's slim majority that their specious reasoning has been rejected.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for morning business with Senators permitted to speak therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-341. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry:

"Assembly Joint Resolution No. 60

"Whereas repeated years of low moisture in the national forests of the Sierra Nevada have created stress conditions in the timber which grows in those areas; and

"Whereas that stress and the associated weakening of the general health of the timber, and individual trees within the stands of timber, have reduced the ability of those trees to fight off attacks of natural enemies, specifically insects; and

"Whereas populations of harmful insects have increased to epidemic proportions and are continuing to increase; and

"Whereas those conditions have resulted in unprecedented timber mortality in the affected national forests; and

"Whereas two billion board feet of timber has been lost due to insect damage in 1989, one billion of which is merchantable, which quantity exceeds the amount of timber lost in forest fires in 1987; and

"Whereas the existence of large quantities of dead timber exacerbates the insect problem by providing rich breeding grounds for insect populations; and

"Whereas dead timber can be utilized for useful products for only a relatively short period of time after it has died; and

"Whereas the established resources management programs of the United States Forest Service have been significantly disrupted by changing priorities due to pressures to limit the quantity of forest-produced commodity goods and services available to the public in this country, and individual forest units are generally unable to react in a timely manner to this resource emergency as a result of those changing priorities; and

"Whereas although much of the damaged timber is not commercial in nature, accessible, or located upon environmentally sensitive lands, to fail to take emergency measures to harvest commercial timber from commercially classed lands will certainly result in a dangerous buildup of forest fuels, increasing the risk of forest fires and thereby endangering high-value timber, wildlife, recreation, watershed, and private residential lands in the area; and

"Whereas the best defense against insect depredation is the maintenance of strong and healthy timber stands; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Regional Forester of the Southwest Region of the United States Forest Service to take all appropriate action, including requesting additional money and staff, if needed, to ensure the prompt and timely salvage of the timber that is dead, dying, or likely to die as a result of the massive buildup of the insect population; and be it further

"Resolved, That the United States Forest Service is respectfully memorialized to engage in prompt efforts to rehabilitate and reforest the affected lands to encourage the development of strong and healthy timber stands through purposeful forest management practices; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the United States Secretary of Agriculture, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-342. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"Assembly Joint Resolution No. 4

"Whereas, discrimination based on age, gender, national origin, or ancestry violates our nation's primary ideals and tears our nation's social and economic fabric; and

"Whereas, discrimination based on age, gender, national origin, or ancestry cannot be tolerated or condoned but must be discouraged by every level and branch of government; and

"Whereas, discriminatory practices by certain social clubs have impaired or denied the rights of citizens to fully and openly participate in the social and economic life of their communities; and

"Whereas, citizens are free to choose their associations but should have no right to receive a collective tax benefit at the expense of their fellow citizens whose rights and dignity are effectively impaired or denied by those associations; and

"Whereas, the federal government already prohibits tax exempt status for social clubs with certain discriminatory practices; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation amending Section 501(i) of the Internal Revenue Code so as to deny tax exempt status to those social clubs which practice discrimination based on age, gender, national origin, or ancestry; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-343. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"Assembly Joint Resolution No. 20

"Whereas, throughout California, people are becoming more concerned about the critical shortage of affordable housing for low- and middle-income families; and

"Whereas, the strain of buying a home in California has become worse, as mortgage interest rates are rising and are expected to continue to rise gradually, further reducing the number of families who can afford to buy homes; and

"Whereas, during the last few months of 1988, the affordability index was at a record low, with the number of people who could afford homes at 12 percent; and

"Whereas, one of the biggest roadblocks to first-time home purchase, especially for younger families, is the downpayment, as many potential purchasers cannot afford the monthly mortgage payment, and assembling the large downpayment required for even a moderately priced home keeps these consumers out of the homebuying market; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California memorializes the President and Congress of the United States to enact federal legislation addressing and providing necessary relief from these problems, to provide as follows:

(1) An individual retirement account or qualified cash or deferred arrangement under Section 401(k) of the Internal Revenue Code shall not lose its tax-exempt status if amounts are distributed to, or it is used as security for a loan by, an eligible participant for the acquisition of any dwelling unit which is to be used as the principal residence of the eligible participant in exchange for an ownership interest in that residence. An "eligible participant" means an individual on whose behalf an individual retirement plan is established or who is a participant in a qualified cash or deferred arrangement, and who (and whose spouse) has had no present ownership interest in a principal residence during the three-year period ending on the date of the acquisition of that residence.

"(2) Amounts made available under the individual retirement account or qualified cash or deferred arrangement for the acquisition of the residence shall not be treated as taxable distributions.

"(3) An owner of an individual retirement annuity who borrows money under or by use of that contract to use for the acquisition of his or her first home shall not be required to include in gross income the value of that contract.

"(4) Interest deductions relating to loans secured by amounts attributable to qualified cash or deferred arrangements under paragraph (1) shall not be disallowed; and be it further

Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. MITCHELL (for himself and Mr. COHEN):

S. 1756. A bill to provide for the preservation and interpretation of sites associated with Acadian culture in the State of Maine; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

MAINE ACADIAN CULTURE PRESERVATION ACT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise to introduce legislation that will establish a "Maine Acadian Cultural Center." I am pleased to be joined in this effort by my distinguished colleague, Senator COHEN.

Most people think of Acadians only in two contexts.

One is the great poem by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Evangeline. The poem described the mass displacement of the Acadians by the British over a decade beginning in 1755 in which the Acadians were forced from their homes and exiled to other British or French colonies. The other is the best known group of the displaced Acadians, those who resettled in Louisiana and became known as "Cajuns."

The Acadian people first came to North America in the early 17th century, eventually establishing settlements in the region that now includes Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island in eastern Canada.

Many of the Acadians originally settled or resettled in the northern part of what is now the State of Maine, in the area known as the St. John River Valley. It is that group that would be recognized with this legislation.

The legislation would establish a Maine Acadian Culture Preservation Commission. Seven of the eight members of the Commission will be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior from nominations submitted by Maine groups or individuals.

Commission members will advise the National Park Service how to conduct activities and programs to interpret the story of Maine's Acadian settlers and their descendants as well as preserving and perpetuating Acadian music, arts, crafts, and folklore. That will occur in three principal ways.

First, assisting efforts to identify, gather, and preserve sites, data, artifacts, and objects associated with Acadians in Maine.

Second, entering into cooperative agreements with owners of properties of natural, historical, or cultural significance so they can be visited and enjoyed by the public.

Third, establishing a center whose activities would celebrate, preserve, and perpetuate Acadian culture.

My legislation would require the Federal Government to cover the full costs associated with the Commission, which we expect to be a very modest amount. But Federal financial support would be limited to 50 percent of the costs of the cooperative agreements and the cultural center. The remainder would have to come from State or local sources, including private donations.

There is growing interest in Maine in preserving Acadian culture. Just this year, the Maine legislature has approved a $150,000 grant to the University of Maine at Fort Kent to house Franco-American and Acadian cultural archives. I also want to give credit to the Speaker of Maine's House of Representatives, John Martin, who first raised this concept with me.

I am sorry to say that most Americans know very little about the Acadian people who have lived in this country and the State of Maine for more than 200 years.

In that time, they have greatly contributed to the culture, history, and economic growth of Maine and the Nation.

Those contributions deserve to be recognized. It is equally important that the culture and history of this people be celebrated and preserved lest it be lost to future generations.

I sincerely hope that will be accomplished through enactment of this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section analysis of the proposed Maine Acadian Culture Preservation Act and the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1756

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Maine Acadian Culture Preservation Act".

SEC. 2. PURPOSES.

The purposes of this Act are to—

(1) recognize an important contribution made to American culture and history by the Acadian immigrants from France who settled in Nova Scotia and, following expulsion by the British in 1755, resettled in various North American colonies, including the territory that eventually became the State of Maine;

(2) assist local and State governments and other public and private entities in the State of Maine in interpreting the story of the State's Acadian settlers and their descendants as well as preserving and perpetuating Acadian music, arts, crafts, and folklore; and

By Mr. BIDEN:

S. 1757. A bill to amend title 28, United States Code, to provide special habeas corpus procedures in capital cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HABEAS CORPUS REFORM ACT

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, for some time now the Senate, on both sides of the aisle, has expressed its displeasure over the way our Federal courts review death penalty sentences imposed in State criminal trials. Some Senators have complained about the delays involved in these Federal habeas corpus actions, as they are known, and others have complained about the lack of adequate counsel available to capital prisoners who are seeking full and fair review of their claims; that is, people who have been convicted of a capital offense.

Last year's drug bill, the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, set out a procedure to consider legislation or for considering legislation to reform the habeas corpus actions in capital cases. The act provided that, following the report of the special committee on habeas corpus reform, chaired by now retired Justice of the Supreme Court Lewis F. Powell, I was instructed, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to "introduce a bill to modify Federal habeas corpus procedures after having faithfully considered the report and recommendations of the special committee."

As required by law, I have studied the report of the Powell committee and today, within the provisions provided by the act, I am introducing a habeas corpus reform bill.

Before I explain some of the particulars of my bill, let me examine the basic principle of the Powell Commission's report on habeas corpus.

The Powell Committee studies the issue that we have debated for many, many years here in the Senate. It has been the issue of debate, I know the Presiding Officer knows, at least for the 17 years that I have been a Senator and I suspect for the many more years that the Presiding Officer has been in the U.S. Senate. We found that much of the delay in capital cases was attributable to repetitive applications for habeas corpus review in Federal courts.

In response, the Powell committee recommended that a special procedure be created for capital cases that would provide each State prisoner with a single opportunity to litigate all available claims available to him or her in Federal court. In other words, the committee recommended that the State prisoner get just one bite out of the apple.

The committee recognized, however, that review of death sentences is an enormously serious and important undertaking and that if there were to be only a single opportunity for Federal review of the State death cases, the procedure would have to provide the prisoner in question new safeguards, safeguards that do not now exist. Nothing less would be sufficient to guard against the possibility of mistake or prejudice in carrying out the death sentence, according to the Powell committee.

Therefore, the Powell committee proposed that the one-bite-at-the-apple rule would apply but only if the prisoner had been afforded court-appointed counsel at every step of the proceedings for them to be able to make this habeas corpus one-bite-at-the-apple procedure. If the State provides such counsel—that is, court-appointed counsel—to capital prisoners, the Powell committee proposed they could limit those prisoners to a single round of litigation in Federal court.

This quid pro quo is the essence of the Powell plan. The bill I am introducing today adopts this quid pro quo approach. It provides that State prisoners who are afforded qualified counsel at trial and throughout State death penalty proceedings shall have only a single opportunity to litigate their habeas corpus claim in Federal court.

Mr. President, some may think this odd for the Senator from Delaware, who opposed the changes in this rule on past occasions, largely due to the risk of error in the applications to be proposing legislation that will, to use the common description given by some, speed up execution. But I see no irony in this proposal. Delay for delay's sake serves no one in the capital punishment system—a system that I do not oppose on moral grounds, have occasionally supported for specific death penalty cases, and generally have argued more safeguards should be built into the system when there is going to be a capital offense available to the prosecution.

It is, obviously, harmful to the system itself and to the families of crime victims and to all if, in fact, the system is allowed to be, shall we say, prostituted; allowed to be used and manipulated in a way that was never intended. But, less obviously, it does nothing for the capital prisoner, either.

The current system does much to delay the inevitable and does too little to help the prisoner with legitimate challenges to their sentences brought before the Supreme Court through habeas corpus.

The Powell quid pro quo, which I support, recognizes this. With some simple, but essential, changes, it should result in a system that is an improvement over the present system in all respects.

My bill adopts the structure and text of the legislation recommended by the Powell committee in many respects, but there are a number of areas in which I have made changes necessary, in my view, to ensure that this streamlined procedure is as fair as possible.

First, it is essential to the success of the Powell committee's approach that the counsel appointed to represent the defendant in State proceedings be qualified counsel. The Powell report included no standards governing the qualifications of attorneys appointed in capital cases, but yet spoke to the need for qualified counsel. My bill includes such standards, adopting the minimums enacted by Congress in the 1988 drug bill as part of the appointment of counsel requirement made applicable by that law.

In other words, we have already set the standards in the 1988 drug bill where we call for the appointment of counsel in specific circumstances and we set out criteria for that counsel that that counsel must meet. Essentially what I do, Mr. President, is take that standard and apply it to the habeas corpus cases, as well.

Second, the Powell report provides for a second Federal habeas corpus application in only the most narrow circumstances, when the claim of factual innocence was not previously presented due to State action or facts not available at the time. I believe that this safety valve provision should be broader than that recommended by the Powell Committee.

For example, in my bill, a prisoner can bring a second habeas corpus application in Federal court if—and I say if—it is necessary to avoid a miscarriage of justice, an established legal standard currently in place that ensures that in extraordinary cases justice will be done. The Powell plan repeals this miscarriage of justice exception. I believe it is necessary to provide the Federal court with the power to prevent unjust executions.

Third, the Powell report limits claims prisoners can raise in Federal court to those claims raised earlier in State court proceedings. While I understand the principles motivating this proposal, I believe that, if we are going to adopt the one-bite-out-of-the-apple approach, the single review provided in Federal court must be as thorough as possible. Keep in mind, Mr. President, what I am proposing here and what the Powell commission is proposing is a significant change in what is presently available.

There is no one-bite-out-of-the-apple. You can take, 3, 2, 10, 9,000, if possible, bites out of the apple. That is the reason for the reform.

The bill I am proposing and what the Powell commission proposed is only one shot in Federal court. And my view, Mr. President, is that we should, in fact, not limit that one bite out of the apple to only issues raised in State courts if there is good reason for there to be additional issues raised.

Therefore, my bill would allow a prisoner to present in Federal court any claim that bears on the legality of his death sentence, as long as the reasons that this claim was not presented in State court was due to ignorance or neglect of his attorney, or, again, if the court's failure to consider such claim would result in the miscarriage of justice.

So, notwithstanding the fact, Mr. President, I propose a claim may be brought that was not raised in State court in this one chance in Federal court, even under those circumstances I limit it, as does the Powell commission. It is limited only to circumstances where there was ignorance on the part of the attorney representing the person sitting on death row, and therefore it did not get raised, or, the second provision I put in my bill, there would be a miscarriage of justice resulting. Obviously, that is a judgment for the court to make, if there would be a miscarriage of justice.

Fourth, the Powell committee recommended that the time period for filing habeas corpus petitions should be limited to 6 months. Currently there is no time limit whatsoever. I agree that there should be some time limit on filing such petitions for otherwise a prisoner with no incentive to speed the arrival his State execution might delay the filing of his claim indefinitely. Six months, however, is too short a time for a qualified and presumably very busy attorney to drop what other work he or she might be doing, conduct a thorough investigation of the case, and prepare an appropriate filing for this one bite out of the apple.

For that reason, Mr. President, my bill would require the State habeas corpus petition to be filed within 1 year.

Finally, Mr. President, the Powell committee made no provision for capital prisoners who have the benefit of favorable Supreme Court rulings decided after their trial and direct appeals. My bill remedies this and instructs the court to apply the most recent Supreme Court ruling to the claims brought by capital prisoners where appropriate. Again, if we are going to speed the process under which the death sentences are reviewed, then it seems to me we must do all we can to ensure the review proceedings are complete.

Again, we are making a significant tradeoff here. Right now there are no limits on the number of times a prisoner can seek habeas corpus in a Federal court. We are limiting that to one time.

In sum, I believe the proposal I am introducing today is a reasonable compromise among the competing concerns in this area, balancing a prisoner's right to have full review of his claims with the State's interest in ending delay in capital sentences. Hopefully it will give us a system that is both faster and fairer for all conerned.

Mr. President, in closing I commend the Powell committee for its thorough work and thoughtful recommendations. I am pleased to announce today our first hearing on habeas corpus reform will be held on November 8, and our first witness at that hearing will be the distinguished Justice Powell himself.

I look forward to having his insights on his proposal and the bill that I am introducing today. The President's plan, and any other alternatives that may be proposed in the coming weeks, will also be considered at that time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a side-by-side comparison of my bill and the Powell committee's recommendations be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1757

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Habeas Corpus Reform Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. SPECIAL HABEAS CORPUS PROCEDURES IN CAPITAL CASES.

Title 28, United States Code, is amended by inserting the following new chapter immediately following chapter 153:

"CHAPTER 154—SPECIAL HABEAS CORPUS PROCEDURES IN CAPITAL CASES

"Sec.

"2256. Prisoners in State custody subject to capital sentence; appointment of counsel; requirement of rule of court or statute; procedures for appointment.

"2257. Mandatory stay of execution; duration; limits on stays of execution; successive petitions.

"2258. Filing of habeas corpus petition; time requirements; tolling rules.

"2259. Evidentiary hearings; scope of Federal review; district court adjudication.

"2260. Certificate of probable cause inapplicable.

"2261. Counsel in capital cases; trial and post-conviction; standards.

"2262. Law controlling in Federal habeas corpus proceedings; retroactivity.

"§ 2256. Prisoners in State custody subject to capital sentence; appointment of counsel; requirement of rule of court or statute; procedures for appointment

"(a) This chapter shall apply to cases arising under section 2254 of this title brought by prisoners in State custody who are subject to a capital sentence. It shall apply only if subsections (b) and (c) are satisfied.

"(b) This chapter is applicable if a State establishes by rule of its court of last resort or by statute a mechanism for the appointment, compensation, and payment of reasonable fees and litigation expenses of competent counsel consistent with section 2261 of this title.

"(c)(1) Upon receipt of notice that counsel has been appointed to represent a prisoner under sentence of death after the prisoner's conviction and sentence have been upheld on direct review in a State court of last resort and in the Supreme Court of the United States if application is made to that court, the State court of last resort shall enter an order confirming the appointment and shall direct its clerk to forward the record of the case to the attorney appointed.

"(2) Upon receipt of notice that counsel has been offered to, but declined by, such a prisoner, the State court of last resort shall direct an appropriate court or judge to hold a hearing, at which the prisoner and the attorney offered to the prisoner shall be present, to determine whether the prisoner is competent to decide whether to accept or reject the appointment of counsel and whether, if competent, the prisoner knowingly and intelligently waives the appointment of counsel. The court or judge shall report its determinations to the State court of last resort, which shall review the determinations for error. If the State court of last resort concludes that the prisoner is incompetent and does not waive counsel, the court shall enter an order confirming the appointment of the attorney assigned to the prisoner by the appointing authority and shall direct the clerk to forward the record to the attorney appointed. If the court concludes that the prisoner is competent and waives counsel, the court shall enter an order that counsel need not be appointed and shall direct the clerk to forward the record to the prisoner: Provided, That nothing in this section requires the appointment of counsel to a prisoner who is not indigent.

"(d) No counsel appointed pursuant to subsections (b) and (c) to represent a State prisoner in State collateral proceedings shall have previously represented the prisoner at trial or on direct appeal in the case for which the appointment is made unless the prisoner and counsel expressly request continued representation.

"(e) The ineffectiveness or incompetence of counsel appointed under this chapter during State or Federal collateral post-conviction proceedings shall not be a ground for relief in a proceeding arising under this chapter or section 2254 of this title. This limitation shall not preclude the appointment of different counsel at any phase of State or Federal post-conviction proceedings.

"§ 2257. Mandatory stay of execution; duration; limits on stays of execution; successive petitions

"(a) Upon the entry in the State court of last resort of an order pursuant to section 2256(c) of this title, a warrant or order setting an execution date for a State prisoner shall be stayed upon application to any court that would have jurisdiction over any proceedings filed pursuant to section 2254 of this title. The application must recite that the State has invoked the post-conviction review procedures of this chapter and that the scheduled execution is subject to stay.

"(b) A stay of execution granted pursuant to subsection (a) shall expire if—

"(1) a State prisoner fails to file a habeas corpus petition under section 2254 of this title within the time required in section 2258 of this title; or

"(2) upon completion of district court and court of appeals review under section 2254 of this title the petition for relief is denied and—

"(A) the time for filing a petition for certiorari has expired and no petition has been filed;

"(B) a timely petition for certiorari was filed and the Supreme Court denied the petition; or

"(C) a timely petition for certiorari was filed and upon consideration of the case, the Supreme Court disposed of it in a manner that left the capital sentence undisturbed; or

"(3) before a court of competent jurisdiction, in the presence of counsel and after having been advised of the consequences of his decision, a State prisoner under capital sentence waives the right to pursue habeas corpus review under section 2254 of this title.

"(c) If one of the conditions in subsection (b) has occurred, no Federal court thereafter shall have the authority to enter a stay of execution or grant relief in a capital case unless—

"(1) the basis for the stay and request for relief is a claim not previously presented by the prisoner in the State or Federal courts, and the failure to raise the claim is—

"(A) the result of State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States;

"(B) the result of the Supreme Court recognition of a new Federal right that is retroactively applicable; or

"(C) based on a factual predicate that could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence; or

"(2) the facts underlying the claim would be sufficient, if proven, to undermine the court's confidence in the jury's determination of guilt on the offense or offenses for which the death penalty was imposed; or

"(3) a stay and consideration of the requested relief are necessary to prevent a miscarriage of justice.

"§ 2258. Filing of habeas corpus petition; time requirements; tolling rules

"Any petition for habeas corpus relief under section 2254 of this title must be filed in the appropriate district court not later than 365 days after the date of filing in the State court of last resort of an order issued in compliance with section 2256(c) of this title. The time requirements established by this section shall be tolled—

"(1) from the date that a petition for certiorari is filed in the Supreme Court until the date of final disposition of the petition if a State prisoner seeks review of a capital sentence that has been affirmed on direct appeal by the court of last resort of the State or has otherwise become final for State law purposes;

"(2) during any period in which a State prisoner under capital sentence has a properly filed request for post-conviction review pending before a State court of competent jurisdiction; if all State filing rules are met in a timely manner, this period shall run continuously from the date that the State prisoner initially files for post-conviction review until final disposition of the case by the State court of last resort, and further until final disposition of the matter by the Supreme Court of the United States, if a timely petition for review is filed; and

"(3) during an additional period not to exceed 90 days, if counsel for the State prisoner—

"(A) moves for an extension of time in the United States district court that would have proper jurisdiction over the case upon the filing of a habeas corpus petition under section 2254 of this title; and

"(B) makes a showing of good cause for counsel's inability to file the habeas corpus petition within the 365-day period established by this section.

"§ 2259. Evidentiary hearings; scope of Federal review; district court adjudication

"(a) Whenever a State prisoner under a capital sentence files a petition for habeas corpus relief to which this chapter applies, the district court shall—

"(1) determine the sufficiency of the evidentiary record for habeas corpus review; and

"(2) conduct any requested evidentiary hearing necessary to complete the record for habeas corpus review.

"(b) Upon the development of a complete evidentiary record, the district court shall rule on the merits of the claims properly before it.

"(c)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), a district court may refuse to consider a claim under this section if—

"(A) the prisoner previously failed to raise the claim in State court at the time and in the manner prescribed by State law;

"(B) the State courts, for that reason, refused or would refuse to entertain the claim; and

"(C) such refusal would constitute an adequate and independent State law ground that would foreclose direct review of the State court judgment in the United States Supreme Court.

"(2) A district court shall consider a claim under this section if the prisoner shows that the failure to raise the claim in a State court was due to the ignorance or neglect of the prisoner or counsel or if the failure to consider such a claim would result in a miscarriage of justice.

"§ 2260. Certificate of probable cause inapplicable

"The requirement of a certificate of probable cause in order to appeal from the district court to the court of appeals does not apply to habeas corpus cases subject to this chapter except when a second or successive petition is filed.

"§ 2261. Counsel in capital cases; trial and post-conviction; standards

"(a) A mechanism for the provision of counsel services to indigents sufficient to invoke the provisions of this chapter under section 2256(b) of this title shall provide for counsel to indigents charged with offenses for which capital punishment is sought, to indigents who have been sentenced to death and who seek appellate or collateral review in State court, and to indigents who have been sentenced to death and who seek certiorari review in the United States Supreme Court.

"(b)(1) In the case of an appointment made before trial, at least one attorney appointed under this chapter must have been admitted to practice in the court in which the prosecution is to be tried for not less than 5 years, and must have had not less than 3 years' experience in the trial of felony prosecutions in that court.

"(2) In the case of an appointment made after trial, at least one attorney appointed under this chapter must have been admitted to practice in the court of last resort of the State for not less than 5 years, and must have had not less than 3 years' experience in the handling of appeals in that State courts in felony cases.

"(3) Notwithstanding this subsection, a court, for good cause, may appoint another attorney whose background, knowledge, or experience would otherwise enable the attorney to properly represent the defendant, with due consideration of the seriousness of the possible penalty and the unique and complex nature of the litigation.

"(c) Upon a finding in ex parte proceedings that investigative, expert or other services are reasonably necessary for the representation of the defendant, whether in connection with issues relating to guilt or issues relating to sentence, the court shall authorize the defendant's attorney to obtain such services on behalf of the defendant and shall order the payment of fees and expenses therefor, under subsection (d). Upon finding that timely procurement of such services could not practicably await prior authorization, the court may authorize the provision of and payment of such services nunc pro tunc.

"(d) Notwithstanding the rates and maximum limits generally applicable to criminal cases and any other provision of law to the contrary, the court shall fix the compensation to be paid to an attorney appointed under this subsection and the fees and expenses to be paid for investigative, expert, and other reasonably necessary services authorized under subsection (c), at such rates or amounts as the court determines to be reasonably necessary to carry out the requirements of this subsection.

"§ 2262. Law controlling in Federal habeas corpus proceedings; retroactivity

"In cases subject to this chapter, all claims shall be governed by the law as it was when the petitioner's sentence became final, supplemented by any interim change in the law, if the court determines, in light of the purpose to be served by the change, the extent of reliance on previous law by law enforcement authorities, and the effect on the administration of justice, that it would be just to give the prisoner the benefit of the interim change in the law.".

SIDE-BY-SIDE COMPARISON OF POWELL AND BIDEN BILLS—Continued

Section	Powell bill	Biden bill
2261	No provision	Standards for appointment of counsel: The standards are the same as those enacted in the 1988 drug bill for death penalty cases (21 U.S.C. 848(q)(4)), except that counsel for collateral review would be different from trial counsel.
2262	No provision	The Federal habeas court could determine, on the basis of a balancing test, whether changes in the law would apply retroactively to issues raised habeas cases.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Delaware for his interest in habeas corpus matters. We had a hearing a couple of weeks ago in which the distinguished chairman presided. We had a lady there whose face had been disfigured. A defendant killed three people and he tried to kill her and thought he killed her and he left her for dead. Anyway, she was able to come to testify.

This defendant was tried and convicted 10 years ago, and he was sentenced to the electric chair. And he has had his fourth appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. His fourth appeal is pending now.

This is utterly ridiculous. It brings the criminal justice system in disrepute and we must take steps to pass a habeas corpus bill that remedies this situation.

I am glad the distinguished Senator has introduced a bill on this subject and I shall introduce the recommendation of the Powell committee. We will have those two bills before the committee. I have already introduced a bill now before the committee, which I think is a good bill. But we will have all three there as we consider the matter and try to get the best out of all three.

I do think this is important. I hope the Members of the Senate will act promptly on this measure and not delay it. It needs to be passed. Some of these defendants have gone to the Supreme Court over and over again; although the State courts have settled the matters many years ago.

I look forward to working with the distinguished chairman on this important subject.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I say to the Senator that he has been calling for this reform for some years now. I hope he will have an opportunity to look closely at the proposal I have made. Nonetheless, however it works out, I look forward to working with him and I am sure we will be able to resolve it.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I feel sure we will be able to bring in a good bill. We have the one my colleagues introduced and the one I introduced and, for the record, the recommendations of the Powell committee. We will try to take them all and get the best of all three and bring it to the Senate.

I thank the chairman again for his interest in this matter. It is very important to the welfare of this country and to promote the criminal justice system.

By Mr. GLENN (for himself, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. KOHL, Mr. SASSER, and Mr. RUDMAN):

S. 1758. A bill to provide for the establishment of an Office for Small Government Advocacy, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

SMALL GOVERNMENTS REGULATORY PARTNERSHIP ACT

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Small Governments Regulatory Partnership Act. Small governments are at the core of the American federalist system—yet we in the Federal Government often forget them, disregard them, or underestimate the role and effect of them.

Small governments provide most of our citizens with their first and most consistent contact with participatory democracy. Many Americans live in towns, townships, and villages primarily administered by volunteers. These are the communities where everyone pitches in to govern, and the quality of government service provided is made better because of it.

Local governments form the base upon which the success of our most vital national programs rests. We in Washington entrust local officials throughout the country with the implementation of Federal plans to safeguard our citizens' environment, their health, and their livelihood.

It is possible, however, that the Federal Government can ask too much of local governments. Placing large regulatory burdens on small governments can stifle creative community programs and discourage enthusiastic local volunteers—in short, endanger and undercut the very policies devised and promoted at the Federal level.

In 1980, Congress passed the Regulatory Flexibility Act—RFA—to ensure that this sort of uneven regulatory burden-sharing would not occur. The RFA applies to virtually every Federal regulation. Briefly, the RFA mandates that when a Federal agency issues a regulation, it must certify whether the regulation will affect "small entities"—small businesses and small governments. And, the agency must propose alternative regulations which would achieve the same purpose but place less burden on small entities.

Last Congress, in a hearing before the Governmental Affairs Committee, witnesses testified that the Regulatory Flexibility Act is not working for small governments. Nine years ago, the National Science Foundation reported that local governments dealt with more than 1,000 Federal and State mandates annually; our witnesses told us that, during the 1980's, this number has increased dramatically.

The committee found three particular weaknesses in the act. First, the RFA assigns responsibility for its enforcement to the Small Business Advocate, who is part of the Small Business Administration. The Advocate is understandably more interested in convincing Federal agencies to apply the RFA to small businesses than he is in convincing them to apply it to small governments. Second, the RFA's waiver provisions allow Federal agencies to bypass some of the act's requirements without adequate explanation. And third, in attempting to comply with the RFA, many Federal agencies do not have access to reliable or complete data to analyze the effects of their proposed regulations on small governments.

The bill I am now introducing, the Small Governments Regulatory Partnership Act, addresses each of these issues. To improve enforcement of the RFA for small governments, the bill establishes an Office for Small Government Advocacy in the Office of Management and Budget. The bill vests this Office with powers similar to those of the Office of the Small Business Advocate. The Office for Small Government Advocacy will monitor Federal agency compliance with the Regulatory Flexibility Act, and track the regulatory burden imposed by the Federal Government on small communities.

The Office for Small Government Advocacy will be aided by Small Government Coordinators, which the bill establishes in each of the major rulemaking agencies. These Coordinators will watch their own agencies' actions under the Regulatory Flexibility Act and provide support and data to the Office for Small Government Advocacy. At least two times a year, these Coordinators will meet on an interagency committee to share information.

The Office for Small Government Advocacy will also have the benefit of advice from a council created by the bill that will be comprised of outside experts; many of these experts will be acting local officials.

Another component of the Small Governments Regulatory Partnership

Act consists of amendments to the RFA itself. For example, the bill clarifies that the Regulatory Flexibility Act applies to small governments as well as to small businesses. Also, the bill makes it more difficult for agencies to exercise some of the RFA's waiver provisions; for instance the legislation requires that agencies back up, with some evidence and citation of data sources, claims that a proposed regulation will have no ill effects on small entities.

Finally, the Small Governments Regulatory Partnership Act addresses the problem of inadequate data on small governments. It requires agencies to use standard measures when analyzing the effect of regulations on small governments. It also mandates that agencies collect these data using uniform procedures. These provisions should make it easier for different offices within one agency to share such data, and for the Federal Government as a whole to track its regulatory impact on small governments more accurately.

In brief, the Small Governments Regulatory Partnership Act can make the RFA work for local governments. It will force those of us in Washington to face the fact that we do indeed operate in a federal system. And, it will force us to be cognizant of the effects that our legislation and regulations have on our Nation's small communities.

Local governments have always been our partners—but too often our silent partners. And as silent partners, they have often suffered. It is my sincere hope that the Small Governments Regulatory Partnership Act will provide local governments with the clear convincing voice they deserve—and that all of us who care about effective Federal Government want them to have.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague, Senator GLENN, in introducing the Small Governments Regulatory Partnership Act of 1989. This bill is essential to obtaining more effective and consistent application of and compliance with the Regulatory Flexibility Act of 1980.

All too often, the Federal programs we create to respond to real problems result in extensive regulations that sometimes bear little relationship to the real world. Frequently, the regulations are blind to the differences between regulated groups and have been particularly insensitive to the needs of small entities.

I came to the Senate directly from local government. As a former Detroit city council president, I am all too familiar with the difficulties local governments face in responding to the demands put on them by Federal agencies. This burden is great for large metropolitan areas such as Detroit, but it can be overwhelming for those small governments which constitute a majority of the local governments in the Nation.

These small, local governments are often comprised of individuals who work on a part-time or volunteer basis, and who are seldom experts in the wide variety of Federal programs that they must address. Their access to individuals who are experts may be limited or impossible. These individuals are dedicated people who are forced to make do with whatever resources are available to them. Yet our Federal programs frequently overlook these limitations and place unfair burdens on them.

In response to this situation, the Regulatory Flexibility Act of 1980 was enacted to force agencies to take into account the needs and limitations of small entities, both small businesses and small communities, when formulating regulations.

Last September, the Governmental Affairs Committee, chaired by Senator GLENN, held hearings to review the effectiveness of this law. It became apparent that the Regulatory Flexibility Act has not been consistently implemented and compliance by many agencies has been woefully inadequate, particularly with regard to our small communities.

One of the primary reasons cited for the lack of compliance with regard to small communities, was that the office charged with the enforcement of the act, the Office of Advocacy, was located within the Small Business Administration. A natural result of this situation was that the concerns and needs of small communities were lost to the greater emphasis placed on small businesses.

The legislation we are introducing today stems from the concerns raised at the September hearing and the excellent work of the National Association of Towns and Townships in focusing our attention on the problems of small communities. The bill creates a separate framework to increase the sensitivity of agencies to the needs of small, local governments. It establishes an Office for Small Government Advocacy in the Office of Management and Budget similar to the current Office of Advocacy in the Small Business Administration, and establishes small government coordinators in each agency. The bill tightens the certification process which allows agencies to excuse themselves from their responsibilities under the Regulatory Flexibility Act. The Small Governments Regulatory Partnership Act also calls for the development of a comprehensive data bank, similar to the one which now exists for small businesses.

Mr. President, the sooner we pass this bill, the sooner we will realize our earlier promise to this country's small communities. I thank Senator GLENN for his good work in this area and look forward to working with him on getting this bill enacted.●

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the Small Government Regulatory Partnership Act of 1989.

Tennessee has more than 400 governments representing less than 50,000 people. These small counties and communities are centers of farm activity and good places to build strong families and rear children. They are pleasant communities where our seniors retire. They are wholesome retreats from the stresses of city life. They are communities of small businesses and specialized industries. They are a vital part of what makes Tennessee, Tennessee.

This year, this Congress has had considerable discussion of the need to revitalize rural America and to reinvest in this much undervalued American asset. The Small Government Regulatory Partnership Act of 1989 gives us another opportunity to support small communities in Tennessee and in States across our Nation.

These small governments are very different from their larger cousins. Many are managed by volunteers or with very few paid employees. To get the job done, they must spend as much time as possible serving the residents and solving problems, and as little time as possible filling out forms. They must also be allowed the flexibility to join with other communities to solve difficult problems like providing for landfills and toxic waste disposal.

In 1980, the Congress passed the Regulatory Flexibility Act to address some of these issues. In hearings before the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs last year, we found that there were weaknesses in the Regulatory Flexibility Act that needed to be addressed.

We found that to make the law work the way the Congress intended, there must be someone in the executive branch who looks out for the well being of small governments on a day-to-day basis and through every step of the rulemaking process. To address that issue, this legislation creates an Office of Small Government Advocacy in OMB. It requires each Federal agency to designate a small government coordinator to look out for small governments. It requires those who have the responsibility of advocating for small governments to stay in touch with local elected officials through a small government advisory committee. And very importantly, the law requires those responsible to make a detailed annual report to the Congress.

We also found that the law lets agencies off the hook too easily, in terms of assessing the impacts of Federal regulation on small governments. In essence, the agency can get out of looking closely at those impacts by having the Secretary declare that the regulation does not impact small governments. Under this bill, the department will have to justify a finding of no impact, by a detailed analysis. This bill does away with the incentive to avoid the responsibility for considering the impacts on small governments.

Finally, we found that good data about the impact on small governments was hard to come by. The bill designates to GAO the job of organizing the data collection process and developing appropriate measures of regulatory impact on small governments. This is no mean task. There is plenty of room for improvement.

As we struggle with the Federal budget deficit, and as you know the job is getting harder every day, we have a responsibility to try to understand how our actions affect subordinate governments. We know all too well, we cannot do it all from Washington. We need to make sure that what we require of small governments, improves the quality of life for our citizens and does not interfere with the local governments' ability to do the best job they can. The Small Government Regulatory Partnership Act of 1989 is a step in the right direction.●

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise today to join my colleague from Ohio, Senator GLENN, as an original cosponsor of the Small Governments Regulatory Partnership Act, which will close loopholes in the Regulatory Flexibility Act [RFA] and make the Federal regulatory process more responsive to the concerns of State and local governments.

Currently, without substantive discussion or review, Federal agencies can certify a proposed rule would have a negligible effect on small communities, releasing the agency from all RFA requirements. Such a certification has become commonplace since Federal agencies do not have standardized, easily accessible data to use when assessing the impact of a proposed rule on local governments. The result is that our smallest communities find themselves drowning in Federal regulations that were certified as negligible.

The Federal bias against our small communities is amplified by the lack of a true advocate for small governments within Federal agencies. Regulatory flexibility is successfully applied to small businesses through the Small Business Administration but small governments are often left fending for themselves.

My colleagues, no doubt, can think of many examples in their States where Federal regulations place an excessive burden on small governmental units. One example which comes to mind is the application of section 89 of the Internal Revenue Code to State and local governments.

The existing rules, which have been thoroughly discussed on the Senate floor, do not take into account the unique compliance problems of State and local governments. Small governments in Pennsylvania and across the Nation are faced with severe budget constraints, statutorily mandated benefits, and legislated salaries.

However, had the RFA been adhered to as it will be under this legislation, section 89 would have been flagged early on as a disaster waiting to happen and never would have seen the light of day. The harm a proposed regulation could cause a small government will be a key part of the Federal rulemaking process.

Our small towns and townships daily face a variety of challenges in serving the needs of our local neighborhoods. The Federal Government should sensitize itself to their limitations.

This legislation strengthens the Regulatory Flexibility Act in three ways. First, by establishing within the Office of Management and Budget an office for small government advocacy managed by a presidentially appointed director. Second, within each agency a coordinator for small governments will be put into place. Third, a data bank on small governments will be established containing all information collected on the impact of Federal regulations on small governments. With these three provisions in place, small communities with fewer than 50,000 people will be awarded the necessary flexibility in implementing Federal regulations.

This legislation will make Federal rulemaking more responsive with regard to its impact upon State and local governments and will help to lessen the burden of the Federal Government upon our smaller communities.●

S. 1759. A bill for the relief of Amalia Hatzipetrou and Konstantinos Hatzipetrou; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF AMALIA HATZIPETROU AND KONSTANTINOS HATZIPETROU

● Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill with Mr. HOLLINGS for the private relief of Amalia and Konstantinos Hatzipetrou.

Mrs. Hatzipetrou is a 50-year-old Greek national. She has a life-threatening case of cervical cancer and in need of U.S. medical treatment.

She first came to the United States for medical treatment in 1986. She then returned to Greece where her treatment results were less than satisfactory. Currently, she is receiving medical treatment at the University of Pennsylvania Medical Center where her doctors feel she must stay for optimal medical care. However, the Immigration and Naturalization Service has given her until October 25 to return to Greece. This is her final extension.

Many on Capitol Hill have known Mrs. Hatzipetrou's sister, Ms. Liria Vouzikas as the owner of the Senate Hair Salon for a number of years. She, along with the rest of Mrs. Hatzipetrou's siblings, now reside in the United States. Only her parents, aged 89 and 74, still reside in Greece. Her family has suffered one tragedy after another, with a seriously ill brother and the recent loss of a niece. Now, as the family struggles with Amalia Hatzipetrou's health problems, they are fighting to permit her to stay with them in the United States to receive the treatment she needs.●

By Mr. THURMOND:

S. 1760. A bill to amend title 28, United States Code, to provide special habeas corpus procedures in capital cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROVISION OF SPECIAL HABEAS CORPUS PROCEDURES IN CAPITAL CASES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the legislative recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee on Federal Habeas Corpus in Capital Cases chaired by former Associate Supreme Court Justice Lewis Powell. This committee, commonly referred to as the Powell committee, was formed by the Chief Justice William Rehnquist in June of 1988. The Powell committee was charged with inquiring into the "necessity and disirability of legislation directed toward avoiding delay and the lack of finality" in capital cases in which the prisoner had or had not been offered counsel. Pursuant to the Chief Justice's request, the Powell committee has made its recommendations and has proposed a legislative remedy to the problem of habeas corpus review in capital cases. It is these recommendations I introduce today.

This Nation is facing a crisis in its criminal justice system. Federal habeas corpus and collateral attack procedures are in dire need of reform. This is evidenced by the glut of habeas petitions in the Federal system. The large increases in the number of habeas corpus filings, many of which are frivolous and used as a delaying tactic, require that legislation be enacted to address this problem.

Habeas petitions have grown by vast numbers in recent years. Last year, Federal district courts received an incredible 9,880 habeas petitions. The problem of these numerous filings is compounded by the extraordinary delay in habeas corpus filings. The result is a criminal justice system which is overburdened with piecemeal and repetitious litigation and years of delay between sentencing and a final judicial resolution of the criminal matter.

Mr. President, on August 3 of this year I took the floor and made a statement regarding the need for habeas corpus reform. In that statement I discussed a particular case which exemplifies the problem of habeas corpus abuse. In February of 1979, Ronald Wommer went on an 8-hour crime spree in South Carolina. By the time he was finished, four people were murdered. Woomer, who has never disputed his guilt, was convicted of murder and sentenced to death that summer. He was first sentenced on July 18, 1979—over 10 years ago—to die in the electric chair. He is still on South Carolina's death row. The Woomer case is a prime example of the obstruction of justice and inordinate delay surrounding these habeas corpus cases.

On the first day of this Congress, I introduced legislation, as I have since the 97th Congress, which would appropriately address this problem. My bill, S. 88, is a much broader bill than the legislation I am introducing today as it applies to all criminal cases, not just capital offenses.

Pursuant to law, Senator BIDEN introduced legislation which embodies a modified version of the Powell recommendations. Yet, since the Powell committee spent a significant time formulating its recommendations and the Chief Justice has expressed a belief that the need for strong habeas reform is urgently needed, I believe there should be a Senate vehicle which fully embodies the Powell committee recommendations. As the Judiciary Committee prepares to hold hearings on habeas corpus reform, I look forward to working with Senator BIDEN on S. 88 and the bills we introduce today in an effort to formulate the best legislative solution.

Mr. President, it is appropriate that the Powell committee recommendations be before the Senate for consideration. This legislation I am introducing today proposes new statutory procedures for Federal habeas corpus review of capital sentences. The Powell committee proposal is aimed at achieving the following goal: Capital cases should be subject to one complete and fair course of collateral review in the State and Federal system, free from the time of impending execution, and with the assistance of competent counsel for the defendant. Once this appropriate, fair review is completed, the criminal process should be brought to a conclusion.

This proposal allows a State to bring capital litigation by its prisoners within the new statute by providing competent counsel for inmates on State collateral review. Participation in the new procedures is optional with the States. This legislation also provides for a 6-month period within which a Federal habeas petition must be filed. This 6-month period begins to run on the appointment of counsel for the prisoner and is tolled during the pendency of all State court proceedings. In addition, this legislation provides for an automatic stay of execution, which is to remain in place until Federal habeas proceedings are completed. This provision ensures that habeas claims not be considered by a court under the time pressure of an impending execution.

In summary, this proposal balances the need for finality in death penalty cases with the requirement that a defendant have a fair examination of his claims. Therefore, if the conviction and sentence are found to be appropriate, judicial proceedings will be at an end, absent any exceptional developments in the defendants case.

In closing, we cannot continue to delay action on legislation to correct the growing problem in habeas corpus cases. Criminal cases must be brought to a close. Endless consideration of issues that have no merit in criminal cases and are filed only for purposes of delay must be eliminated from our judicial system. The principles of justice, upon which our criminal system is based, demands that we take action to address the habeas problem.

For these reasons I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this measure.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill and a copy of the Powell committee report be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1760

SPECIAL HABEAS CORPUS PROCEDURES IN CAPITAL CASES

(a) Title 28, United States Code, is amended by inserting the following new chapter immediately following chapter 153:

"CHAPTER 154—SPECIAL HABEAS CORPUS PROCEDURES IN CAPITAL CASES

"Sec.

"2256. Prisoners in State custody subject to capital sentence; appointment of counsel; requirement of rule of court or sttute; procedures for appointment.

"2257. Mandatory stay of execution; duration; limits on stays of execution; successive petitions.

"2258. Filing of habeas corpus petition; time requirements; tolling rules.

"2259. Evidentiary hearings; scope of Federal review; district court adjudication.

§§ 2256. Prisoners in State custody subject to capital sentence; appointment of counsel; requirement of rule of court or statute; procedures for appointment

"(a) This chapter shall apply to cases arising under section 2254 of this title brought by prisoners in State custody who are subject to a capital sentence. It shall apply only if subsections (b) and (c) are satisfied.

"(b) This chapter is applicable if a State establishes by rule of its court of last resort or by statute a mechanism for the appointment, compensation, and payment of reasonable litigation expenses of competent counsel in State post-conviction proceedings brought by indigent prisoners whose capital convictions and sentences have been upheld on direct appeal to the court of last resort in the State to have otherwise become final for State law purposes. The rule of court or statute must provide standards of competency for the appointment of such counsel.

"(c) Any mechanism for the appointment, compensation, and reimbursement of counsel as provided in subsection (b) must offer counsel to all State prisoners under capital sentence and must provide for the entry of an order by a court of record—

"(1) appointing one or more counsel to represent the prisoner upon a finding that the prisoner—

"(A) is indigent and has accepted the offer; or

"(B) is unable competently to decide whether to accept or reject the offer;

"(2) finding, after a hearing, if necessary, that the prisoner has rejected the offer of counsel and made the decision with an understanding of its legal consequences; or

"(3) denying the appointment of counsel upon a finding that the prisoner is not indigent.

"(d) No counsel appointed pursuant to subsections (b) and (c) to represent a State prisoner under capital sentence shall have previously represented the prisoner at trial or on direct appeal in the case for which the appointment is made unless the prisoner and counsel expressly request continued representation.

"(e) The ineffectiveness or incompetence of counsel during State or Federal collateral post-conviction proceedings in a capital case shall not be a ground for relief in a proceeding arising under this chapter or section 2254 of this title. This subsection shall not preclude the appointment of different counsel at any phase of State or Federal post-conviction proceedings.

"§ 2257. Mandatory stay of execution; duration; limits on stays of execution; successive petitions

"(a) Upon the entry in the appropriate State Court of record of an order pursuant to section 2256(c) of this title, a warrant or order setting an execution date for a State prisoner shall be stayed upon application of any court that would have jurisdiction over any proceedings filed pursuant to section 2254 of this title. The application must recite that the State has invoked the post-conviction review procedures of this chapter and that the scheduled execution is subject to stay.

"(b) A stay of execution granted pursuant to subsection (a) shall expire if—

"(1) a State prisoner fails to file a habeas corpus petition under section 2254 of this title within the time required in section 2258 of this title; or

"(2) upon completion of district court and court of appeals review under section 2254 of this title, the petition for relief is denied and—

"(A) the time for filing a petition for certiorari has expired and no petition has been filed, the petition for reflief is denied and—

"(A) the time for filing a petition for certiorari has expired and no petition has been filed;

"(B) a timely petition for certiorari was filed and the Supreme Court denied the petition; or

"(C) a timely petition for certiorari was filed and upon consideration of the case, the Supreme Court disposed of it in a manner that left the capital sentence undisturbed; or

"(3) before a court of competent jurisdiction, a State prisoner under capital sentence waives the right to pursue habeas corpus review under Section 2254 of this title, in the presence of counsel and after having been advised of the consequences of making the waiver.

"(c) If one of the conditions in subsection (b) has occurred, no Federal court thereafter shall have the authority to enter a stay of execution or grant relief in a capital case unless-

"(1) the basis for the stay and request for relief is a claim not previously presented in the State or Federal courts;

"(2) the failure to raise the claim—

"(A) was the result of State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States;

"(B) was the result of a recognition by the Supreme Court of a new Federal right that is retroactively applicable; or

"(C) is due to the fact that the claim is based on facts that could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence in time to prevent the claim for State or Federal post-conviction review; and

"(3) the facts underlying the claim would be sufficient, if proven, to undermine the court's confidence in the jury's determination of guilt on the offense or offenses for which the death penalty was imposed.

"§ 2258. Filing of habeas corpus petition; time requirements; tolling rules

"(a) Any petition for habeas corpus relief under section 2254 of this title must be filed in the appropriate district court not later than 180 days after the filing in the appropriate State court of record of an order issued in compliance with section 2256(c) of this title. The time requirements established by this section shall be tolled—

"(1) from the date that a petition for certiorari is filed in the Supreme Court until the date of final disposition of the petition if a State prisoner seeks review of a capital sentence that has been affirmed on direct appeal by the court of last resort of the State or has otherwise become final for State law purposes;

"(2) subject to subsection (b), during any period in which a State prisoner under capital sentence has a properly filed request for post-conviction review pending before a State court of competent jurisdiction; and

"(3) during an additional period not to exceed 60 days, if counsel for the State prisoner—

"(A) moves for an extension of time in the Federal district court that would have jurisdiction over the case upon the filing of a habeas corpus petition under section 2254 of this title; and

"(B) makes a showing of good cause for counsel's inability to file the habeas corpus petition within the 180-day period established by this section.

"(b)(1) The time requirement established by subsection (a) shall be continuously tolled under paragraph (2) of that subsection from the date the State prisoner initially files for post-conviction review until the date of final disposition of the case by the highest court of the State so long as all State filing rules are timely met.

"(2) Tolling shall not occur under subsection (a)(2) during the pendency of a petition for certiorari before the Supreme Court following State post-conviction review.

"§ 2259. Evidentiary hearings; scope of Federal review; district court adjudication

"(a) When a State prisoner under a capital sentence files a petition for habeas corpus relief to which this chapter applies, the district court shall—

"(1) determine the sufficiency of the evidentiary record for habeas corpus review based on the claims actually presented and litigated in the State courts, unless the prisoner shows that the failure to raise or develop a claim in the State courts—

"(A) was the result of State action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States;

"(B) was the result of a recognition by the Supreme Court of a new Federal right that is retroactively applicable; or

"(C) is due to the fact that the claim is based on facts that could not have been discovered through the execise of reasonable diligence in time to present the claim for State post-conviction review; and

"(2) conduct any requested evidentiary hearing necessary to complete the record for habeas corpus review.

"(b) Upon the development of a complete evidentiary record, the district court shall rule on the merits of the claims properly before it.

"§ 2260. Certificate of probable cause inapplicable

"The requirement of a certificate of probable cause in order to appeal from the district court to the court of appeals does not apply to habeas corpus cases subject to this chapter except when a second or successive petition is filed.".

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, September 22, 1989.

Hon. JOSEPH R. BIDEN, JR.,
Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I forward herewith the report and proposal received by the Judicial Conference of the United States on September 20, 1989, from its Ad Hoc Committee on Federal Habeas Corpus in Capital Cases. The Ad Hoc Committee, chaired by Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., has given careful consideration to this subject over the past year.

In receiving this report, the Judicial Conference determined to discharge Justice Powell's committee, to make the report publicly available, and to defer any further consideration of the report until its next meeting, scheduled for March 13, 1990. I shall advise you at that time as to any additional action the Conference might take with respect to the report.

Sincerly,

WILLIAM H. REHNQUIST.

[Committee report and proposal from the Judicial Conference of the United States ad hoc Committee on Federal Habeas Corpus in Capital Cases, Aug. 23, 1989]

AD HOC COMMITTEE ON FEDERAL HABEAS CORPUS IN CAPITAL CASES COMMITTEE REPORT

I. INTRODUCTION

Studies of public opinion establish that an overwhelming majority of our citizens favors the death penalty for certain murders. The Supreme Court has made clear that the evolving standards of decency embodied in the Eighth Amendment permit imposition of this punishiment for some offenders. Of course, both the Court and society have recognized that, because it is irreversible, death is a unique punishment. This realization demands safeguards to ensure that capital punishment is administered with the utmost reliability and fairness.

But our present system of multi-layered state and federal appeal and collateral review has led to piecemeal and repetitious litigation, and years of delay between sentencing and a judicial resolution as to whether the sentence was permissible under the law. The resulting lack of finality undermines public confidence in our criminal justice system. Of course, any system of review entails some delay. It is not suggested that the delay needed for review of constitutional claims is inappropriate. But much of the delay inherent in the present system is not needed for fairness. Adding to the problem is the fact that prisoners often cannot obtain qualified counsel until execution is imminent. The resulting last-minute rushed litigation disserves inmates, and saps the resources of our judiciary.

To address these problems, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist formed this Committee in June 1988. His charge to us was to inquire into "the necessity and desirability of legislation directed toward avoiding delay and the lack of finality" in capital cases in which the prisoner had or had been offered counsel. The Chief Justice appointed as members of this Committee Chief Judge Clark of the Fifth Circuit, Chief Judge Roney of the Eleventh Circuit, District Judge Hodges of Florida and District Judge Sanders of Texas. The States in the Fifth And Eleventh Circuits have by far the greatest numbers of prisoners subject to capital sentences, and each of these judges has had extensive experience with federal review of capital cases. The chairman of the Committee, retired Associate Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., served as Circuit Justice for the Eleventh Circuit while sitting on the Supreme Court. Professor Albert M. Pearson of the University of Georgia School of Law, who has experience representing defendants in capital cases, was the Reporter for the Committee. William R. Burchill, Jr., General Counsel of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, served as Secretary.

The Committee met six times and considered with care the problems associated with collateral review of capital sentences. We invited written comments from a broad spectrum of interested parties and organizations, and received a number of helpful presentations. These included the views of state and federal prosecutors groups urging abolition of the death penalty, state executives and legislators, and criminal defense and public defender organizations. The responses contributed to our findings, which follow, and to the formulation of the legislation we propose.

II. FINDINGS

A. Unnecessary Delay and Repetition

The Committee identified serious problems with the present system of collateral review. These many be broadly characterized under the heading of unnecessary delay and repetition. The lack of coordination between the federal and state legal systems often results in inefficient and unnecessary steps in the course of litigation. Prisoners, for example, often spend significant time moving back and forth between the federal and state systems in the process of exhausting state remedies. Frequent litigation over motions for stays of execution is another example of an unnecessary step in the process. Under current procedures, a prisoner has no incentive to move the collateral review process forward until an execution date is set, and at this point additional litigation over a request for a stay of execution is inevitable.

The existing system also fosters piecemeal and repetitive litigation of claims. Because res judicata is inapplicable to federal habeas proceedings, many capital litigants return to federal court, with second—or even third and fourth—petitions for relief. Current rules governing abuse of the writ and successive petitions have not served to prevent these endless filings. Another example of piecemeal litigation is the fact that current rules allow at least three petitions for certiorari to the United States Supreme Court—after direct review, after state collateral proceedings, and after federal collateral proceedings.

Few would argue that the current state of dealth penalty administration is satisfactory. There are now approximately 2,200 convicted murderers on death row awaiting execution. Yet since the Supreme Court's 1972 Furman decision only 116 executions have taken place. The shortest of these judicial proceedings required two years and nine months to complete. The longest covered a period of 14 years and six months. The length of the average proceeding was eight years and two months. The Committee does not believe eight years are required for the appropriate habeas review of state criminal proceedings.

The Committee's analysis of cases from Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, and Texas shows that 80% of the time spent in collateral litigation in death penalty cases occurs outside of state collateral proceedings. A table showing the average time periods and ratios in death penalty cases in these States is attached to this report.

The relatively small number of executions, as well as the delay in cases where an execution has occurred, makes clear that the present system of collateral review operates to frustrate the law of 37 States.[1] The collateral review process tends to be erratic and frequently is repetitious. The long separation of sentence and executive often hampers justice without improving the quality of adjudication.[2] This Committee believes that any serious reform proposal must address the problems of delay and repetitive litigation.

B. The Need for Counsel

A second serious problem with the current system is the pressing need for qualified counsel to represent inmates in collateral review. As the Supreme Court recently reaffirmed in Murray v. Giarratano, provision of counsel for criminal defendants is constitutionally required only for trial and direct appellate review. Because, as a practical matter, the focus of review in capital cases often shifts to collateral proceedings, the lack of adequate counsel creates severe problems. This situation is not likely to be remendied by the new provisions of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 that require appointment of counsel in capital federal habeas corpus proceedings.

Capital inmates almost uniformly are indigent, and often illiterate or uneducated. Capital habeas litigation may be difficult and complex. Prisoners acting pro se rarely present promptly or properly exhaust their constitutional challenges in the state forum. This results in delayed or ineffective federal collateral procedures. The end result is often appointment of qualified counsel only when an execution is imminent. But at this stage, serious constitutional claims may have been waived. The belated entry of a lawyer, under severe time pressure, does not do enough to ensure fairness. In sum, the Committee believes that provision of competent counsel for prisoners under capital sentence throughout both state and federal collateral review is crucial to ensuring fairness and protecting the constitutional rights of capital litigants.

C. Last-Minute Litigation

Another disturbing aspect of the current system is that litigation of constitutional claims often comes only when prompted by the setting of an excution date. Judicial resources are expended as the prisoner must seek a stay of execution in order to present his claims. Justice may be ill-served by conducting judicial proceedings in capital cases under the pressure of an impending excution. In some cases last-minute habeas corps petitions have resulted from the unavailability of counsel at any earlier time. But in other cases attorneys appear to have intentionally delayed filing until time pressures were severe. In most cases, successive petitions are meritless, and we believe many are filed at the eleventh hour seeking nothing more than delay.

The foregoing types of abuses have no place in a rational system of justice. The merits of capital cases should be reviewed carefully and deliberately, and not under time pressure. This should be true both during state and federal collateral review. But once this review has occurred, absent extraordinary circumstances there should be no further last-minute litigation.

III. THE COMMITTEE PROPOSAL

In response to the problems described above, the Committee proposes new statutory procedures for federal habeas corpus review of capital sentences where counsel has been provided. Separate procedures for capital cases are appropriate in light of the special problems of capital litigation. The incentives facing the capital litigant are unique. The inmate under captial sentence, whose guilt frequently is never in question, has every incentive to delay the proceedings that must take place before that sentence is carried out. Such an inmate is avoiding the punishment prescribed by the law of the State. In contrast, prisoners serving an ordinary term of years have every incentive to bring their claims to resolution as soon as possible in order to gain relief. And they are serving their sentences while litigation takes place.

The Committee's proposal is aimed at achieving this goal: Capital cases should be subject to one complete and fair course of collateral review in the state and federal system, free from the time pressure of impending execution, and with the assistance of competent counsel for the defendant. When this review has concluded, litigation should end.

The specific operation of our proposed legislation[3] is described in notes following each statutory section. Some general comments are appropriate here. The proposal allows a State to bring capital litigation by its prisoners within the new statute by providing competent counsel for inmates on state collateral review. Participation in the proposal is thus optional with the States. Becuase it is optional, the proposal should cause minimal intrustion on state prerogatives. But for States that are concerned with delay in capital litigation, it is hoped that the procedural mechanisms we recommend will furnish an incentive to provide the counsel that are needed for fairness.

The statute provides for a six-month period within which the federal habeas petition must be filed. The filing period begins to run only on the appointment of counsel for the prisoner, or a refusal of the offer of counsel. The filing period also is tolled during the pendency of all state court proceedings. In view of the provision of counsel, the tolling provisions, and the fact that the exhaustion requirement mandates that the prisoner's federal petition present the same claims contained in the state petition, the six-month period ensures adequate time for the development and presentation of claims. A further extension of time is available for cases where good cause is shown. Although the time period may seem short in view of the fact that no time limit whatsoever exists at present, it should be noted in comparison that six months is far longer than the time provided for appeals in the state and federal systems, or for seeking certiorari review in the Supreme Court.

Importantly, the statute provides for an automatic stay of execution, which is to remain in place until federal habeas proceedings are completed, or until the prisoner has failed to file a petition within the allotted time. This automatic stay ensures that claims need not be evaluated under the time pressure of scheduled execution. It should substantially eliminate the rush litigation over stay motions that is troubling for both litigants and the judiciary.

Federal habeas proceedings under the proposal will encompass only claims that have been exhausted in state court. With the counsel provided by the statute, there should be no excuse for failure to raise claims in state court. The statute departs from current exhaustion practice by allowing for immediate presentation of new claims in federal court in extraordinary circumstances. In the event the entire counseled state and federal collateral process concludes without relief being granted, the statute includes new mechanisms to promote finality. Subsequent and successive federal habeas petitions can no longer be the basis of a stay of execution or grant of relief absent extraordinary circumstances and a colorable showing of factual innocence.

IV. CONCLUSION

The fundamental requirement of a criminal justice system is fairness. In habeas corpus proceedings fairness requires that a defendant be provided a searching and impartial examination of his claims. Fairness also requires that if a defendant's claims are found to be devoid of merit after such examination, society is rightfully entitled to have the penalty prescribed by law carried out without unreasonable delay.

Every capital defendant is now entitled to competent counsel at state trial and appeal and, under recent congressional enactment, in federal habeas corpus proceedings. The Committee's proposal seeks to fill a gap that now exists by encouraging the appointment of competent counsel also in state habeas or collateral proceedings. The proposal further assures that upon completion of state proceedings a defendant will have one opportunity to have his claims reviewed carefully by the federal courts. Thereafter, if no infirmity in the conviction has been found, judicial proceedings will be at an end, absent exceptional new developments.

The Committee believes that its proposal will go far to rectify the current chaos in capital litigation—periodic inactivity and last-minute frenzied activity, scheduling and rescheduling of execution dates—which diminished public confidence in the criminal justice system. In sum, adoption of this proposal will significantly enhance fairness in death penalty litigation.

STATUTORY PROPOSAL—CHAPTER 153. HABEAS CORPUS

Subchapter A. General Provisions [a proposed redesignation]

[Sections 2241-2255 would not be changed.]

Subchapter B. Capital Cases: Special Procedures [new]

Section 2256. Prisoners in state custody subject to capital sentence; appointment of counsel; requirement of rule of court or statute; procedures for appointment.—

(a) This subchapter shall apply to cases arising under section 2254 brought by prisoners in state custody who are subject to a capital sentence. It shall apply only if the provisions of subsections (b) and (c) are satisfied.

(b) This subchapter is applicable if a State establishes by rule of its court of last resort or by statute a mechanism for the appointment, compensation and payment of reasonable litigation expenses of competent counsel in state post-conviction proceedings brought by indigent prisoners whose capital convictions and sentences have been upheld on direct appeal to the court of last resort in the State or have otherwise become final for state law purposes. The rule of court or statute must provide standards of competency for the appointment of such counsel.

(c) Any mechanism for the appointment, compensation and reimbursement of counsel as provided in subsection (b) must offer counsel to all state prisoners under capital sentence and must provide for the entry of an order by a court of record: (1) appointing one or more counsel to represent the prisoner upon a finding that the prisoner is indigent and accepted the offer or is unable competently to decide whether to accept or reject the offer; (2) finding, after a hearing if necessary, that the prisoner rejected the offer of counsel and made the decision with an understanding of its legal consequences; or (3) denying the appointment of counsel upon a finding that the prisoner is not indigent.

(d) No counsel appointed pursuant to subsections (b) and (c) to represent a state prisoner under capital sentence shall have previously represented the prisoner at trial or on direct appeal in the case for which the appointment is made unless the prisoner and counsel expressly request continued representation.

(e) The ineffectiveness or incompetence of counsel during state or federal collateral post-conviction proceedings in a capital case shall not be a ground for relief in a proceeding arising under section 2254 of this subchapter. This limitation shall not preclude the appointment of different counsel at any phase of state or federal post-conviction proceedings.

Comment: Subsection (a) defines the scope of what would be new subchapter B, which establishes rules and procedures that apply solely to section 2254 cases involving prisoners under capital sentence. The aim of this subchapter is to provide a mechanism for the post-conviction litigation of capital cases that will enhance procedural safeguards for the prisoner and yet is less time consuming and less cumbersome from the viewpoint of the jurisdiction seeking to enforce its death penalty. There is no intent to alter the substantive scope of federal habeas corpus review under section 2254.

Subchapter B offers an alternative to the present process of post-conviction review in capital cases. If it is applicable, it would in all but the most unusual of capital cases limit each prisoner to a single opportunity for federal habeas corpus review under section 2254. This limitation would advance the state interest in the finality of criminal convictions and capital sentences. But to avail itself of subchapter B's more structured habeas corpus review procedures, a State would have to establish a system for the appointment and compensation of competent counsel throughout all stages of state post conviction review. The purpose of this mechanism is to assure that collateral review will be fair, thorough, and the product of capable and committed advocacy. While subchapter B attempts to strike a realistic balance between the values of judicial efficiency and procedural fairness in the context of a federal system, it does not impose a solution on the States. Each State must assess the utility of subchapter B for itself. Unless a State takes the affirmative steps required in sections 2256(b) and (c), its litigation of capital cases under section 2254 will be governed by the statutory and court rules that presently apply to all federal habeas corpus cases.

Central to efficacy of this scheme is the development of standards governing the competency of counsel chosen to serve in this specialized and demanding area of litigation. This mechanism is to be established by state statute or by rule of the state court of last resort. The Committee believes that it is more consistent with the federal-state balance to give the States wide latitude to establish a mechanism that complies with subsection (b). The final judgment as to the adequancy of any system for the appointment of counsel under subsection (b), however, rests ultimately with the federal judiciary. If prisoners under capital sentence in a particular State doubt that a State's mechanism for appointing counsel comports with subsection (b), the adequacy of the system—as opposed to the competency of particular counsel—can be settled through litigation.

If the requirements of subsection (b) are satisfied, the state mechanism must offer counsel to all state prisoners under capital sentence. In addition, it must provide for the entry of an appropriate judicial order based on the state prisoner's response to the offer of counsel. Judicial control of this process is necessary to establish a clear point in time to determine the applicability of sections 2257 and 2258. It is also necessary to assure that a full record exists showing which state prisoners have appointed counsel and which do not.

Under subsection (c), all indigent state prisoners under capital sentence would be entitled to counsel in state post-conviction proceedings as a matter of right. If an indigent prisoner is not competent to decide whether to accept or decline the State's offer, the State must appoint counsel in any event. If a prisoner is not indigent, which would be the rare case, he would not be entitled to the appointment of counsel even if he accepted the State's offer. Finally, in some instances, a prisoner might reject the offer of counsel. This rejection would become effective and binding only after a judicial inquiry into the prisoner's understanding of the legal consequences of his decision.

Subsection (d) establishes a rule requiring the appointment of new counsel at the state post-conviction phase of capital litigation. The primary reason for the rule is that during the post-conviction review, ineffective assistance of trial and appellate counsel is frequently a major issue. It would be unrealistic to expect a capital defendant's trial or appellate counsel to raise a vigorous challenge to his own effectiveness. A secondary reason is that trial and appellate counsel in death penalty cases serve under great pressure and often work themselves to the point of emotional and physical exhaustion. They are understandably less able to undertake a fresh and dispassionate consideration of the issues raised or possibly overlooked at trial and on direct appeal. The appointment of new counsel at the state habeas phase will do as much as can be done to overcome these difficulties. The Committee, however, did not believe the rule should be absolute. In some cases, the prisoner under capital sentence may have such trust and confidence in his trial or appellate counsel that he would desire the attorney-client relationship to continue during state post-conviction review. Subsection (d) would permit, though not require, continued representation if the prisoner and his counsel expressly make a request to the appointing authority established by the State.

Subsection (e) provides that the ineffectiveness or incompetence of counsel during state or federal post-conviction review in a capital case is not a ground for relief in section 2254 proceedings. This rule reflects settled constitutional doctrine which limits ineffective assistance of counsel challenges to those criminal proceedings to which the Sixth Amendment right to counsel attaches. Murray v. Giaratano, 109 S. Ct. 2766 (1989), Pennsylvania v. Finley, 481 U.S. 551 (1987). The Committee recognizes that the competence of counsel during all stages of state and federal post-conviction review is of the utmost importance in capital cases. However, as far as federal review in a proceeding under section 2254 is concerned, it believes that the focus should be on the performance of a capital defendant's trial and appellate counsel. The provision of counsel under the new statute therefore does not involve the creation of any potential claim of ineffective assistance of counsel in collateral review. The effectiveness of state and federal post-conviction counsel is a matter that can and must be dealt with in the appointment process. Only one who has the clear ability and willingness to handle capital cases should be appointed under subsections (b) and (c). If at any time during state or federal post-conviction review it appears that appointed counsel is unable to discharge his obligations in a timely and competent manner, the remedy is for the court to appoint a replacement, and to permit post-conviction review to go forward.

Section 2257. Mandatory stay of execution; duration; limits on stays of execution; successive petitions.—

(a) Upon the entry in the appropriate state court of record of an order pursuant to section 2256(c), a warrant or order setting an execution date for a state prisoner shall be stayed upon application to any court that would have jurisdiction over any proceedings filed pursuant to section 2254. The application must recite that the State has invoked the post-conviction review procedures of this subchapter and that the scheduled execution is subject to stay.

(b) A stay of execution granted pursuant to subsection (a) shall expire if:

(1) A state prisoner fails to file a habeas corpus petition under section 2254 within the time required in section 2258; or

(2) Upon completion of district court and court of appeals review under section 2254 the petition for relief is denied and (A) the time for filing a petition for certiorari has expired and no petition has been filed; (B) a timely petition for certiorari was filed and the Supreme Court denied the petition; or (C) a timely petition for certiorari was filed and upon consideration of the case, the Supreme Court disposed of it in a manner that left the capital sentence undisturbed; or

(3) Before a court of competent jurisdiction, in the presence of counsel and after having been advised of the consequences of his decision, a state prisoner under capital sentence waives the right to pursue habeas corpus review under section 2254.

(c) If one of the conditions in subsection (b) has occurred, no federal court thereafter shall have the authority to enter a stay of execution or grant relief in a capital case unless:

(1) the basis for the stay and request for relief is a claim not previously presented in the state or federal courts;

(2) the failure to raise the claim is (A) the result of state action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States; (B) the result of the Supreme Court recognition of a new federal right that is retroactively applicable; or (C) based on a factual predicate that could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence in time to present the claim for state or federal post-conviction review; and

(3) The facts underlying the claim would be sufficient, if proven, to undermine the court's confidence in the jury's determination of guilt on the offense or offenses for which the death penalty was imposed.

Comment: This subchapter rests on the assumption that every state prisoner under capital sentence should have one opportunity for full state and federal post-conviction review before being subject to execution. Although this appears to have been the practice in capital cases since Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), it has never been formally recognized as such. Many state prisoners under capital sentence have struggled to secure a stay of execution—often against the vigorous opposition of the State—before availing themselves of even one chance to pursue state and federal post-conviction review. Stay of execution litigation often has been subject to tight deadlines, and places unrealistic demands on judges, lawyers, and the prisoner.

If applicable, section 2257 would eliminate stay of execution litigation during a state prisoner's first request for post-conviction relief. It provides for a mandatory stay of execution in capital cases at any time following the appointment of counsel pursuant to section 2256(c). If an execution date has been set, the prisoner can obtain a stay as a matter of right simply by making application to any federal court that would have jurisdiction over the case in a proceeding brought under section 2254. In practice, however, even this step is not likely to be necessary. If a State takes the steps required in section 2256 to bring its capital litigation under this subchapter, there will be no reason to set an execution date until the completion of state and federal post-conviction review. At that juncture, the federal courts would have no authority to stay executions except under the very limited circumstances identified in section 2257(c).

Subsection (b) establishes the duration of a stay of execution issued under this subchapter. In effect, it provides that a stay of execution issued under subsection (a) will remain in effect as long as state and federal post-conviction review in a capital case is being actively pursued by the state prisoner.

The relationship between subsection (b)(1) and section 2258 is particularly important. Under subsection (b)(1), a stay of execution remains in force as long as the state prisoner files a section 2254 petition in federal court within the 180-day period set forth in section 2258. It is important to emphasize here that the object of the 180 days period established in section 2258—which includes the right to apply for a 60-day extension—is not to produce default. Rather it is one of a series of provisions in this subchapter designed to stimulate the orderly and expeditious consideration on the merits of all federal issues arising in capital cases.

If a state prisoner files a petition under section 2254 within the time period set forth in section 2258, subsection (b)(2) extends the right to a stay of execution to include the entire period that the case is pending before the district court, the court of appeals, and the Supreme Court if a petition for certiorari is filed. The right to a stay would expire after the opportunity for Supreme Court review has passed or after the Supreme Court has considered a petition for certiorari and has denied the petition or disposed of the case without overturning the capital sentence. The Committee assumes that in capital cases the state prisoner will want to pursue every opportunity for federal post-conviction review open to him, including Supreme Court review. But once this review process comes to its conclusion with a reversal of the capital sentence, it is the Committee's belief that federal review should end.

In subsection (b)(3), the authority of a federal court to stay the execution of a state prisoner expires if there is a waiver of the right to pursue habeas corpus review under section 2254. To eliminate doubt about the validity of the waiver, subsection (b)(3) requires that the prisoner announce the decision before a court of competent jurisdiction and in the presence of his counsel. It also requires the court—which can be state or federal—to advise the prisoner of the consequences of the waiver decision.

After the occurrence of one of the conditions resulting in the expiration of the right to a mandatory stay of execution under subsection (b)(2), federal review in capital cases pursuant to section 2254 is extremely limited. Subsection (c) would thereafter permit a stay of execution and the grant of relief in a capital case only if: (1) the claim has never been raised in state or federal court previously; (2) there is a valid excuse for not discovering and raising the claim during the prisoner's initial opportunity for state and federal post-conviction review; and (3) the facts underlying the claim raise a serious doubt about the prisoner's guilt of the offense or offenses for which the death penalty was imposed.

The third of these conditions is clearly the most important. In the Committee's view, if there is any doubt about the sentencing phase of a capital case, it should be raised during a state prisoner's initial attempt to obtain post-conviction review. Often factual guilt is not seriously in dispute. Both the prisoner and his counsel have every incentive to ask whether all relevant informaton in mitigation of punishment was presented and whether the sentencing phase of the trial was otherwise conducted in a constitutionally fair manner. Given the clear incentive to do this, the Committee does not believe that the federal courts should have to consider a second petition under section 2254 which challenges only the sentencing phase in a capital case. As subsection (c) reflects, the only appropriate exception is when the new claim goes to the underlying guilt or innocence of the state prisoner under capital sentence.

Section 2258. Filing of habeas corpus petition; time requirements; tolling rules.—Any petition for habeas corpus relief under section 2254 must be filed in the appropriate district court within 180 days from the filing in the appropriate state court of record of an order issued in compliance with section 2256(c). The time requirements established by this section shall be tolled:

(a) From the date that a petition for certiorari is filed in the Supreme Court until the date of final disposition of the petition if a state prisoner seeks review of a capital sentence that has been affirmed on direct appeal by the court of last resort of the State or has otherwise become final for state law purposes.

(b) During any period in which a state prisoner under capital sentence has a properly filed request for post-conviction review pending before a state court of competent jurisdiction; if all state filing rules are met in a timely manner, this period shall run continuously from the date that the state prisoner initially files for post-conviction review until final disposition of the case by the highest court of the State; provided, however, the tolling rule established by this subsection does not apply during the pendency of a petition for certiorari before the Supreme Court following such state post-conviction review.

(c) During an additional period not to exceed 60 days, if counsel for the state prisoner: (1) moves for an extension of time in the federal district court that would have proper jurisdiction over the case upon the filing of a habeas corpus petition under section 2254 and (2) makes a showing of good cause for counsel's inability to file the habeas corpus petition within the 180 day period established by this section.

Comment: Section 2258 requires a state prisoner under capital sentence to file a section 2254 petition within 180 days from the entry of an order under section 2256(c). In almost all cases, this will be an order appointing counsel to initiate state post-conviction review. But even if a state prisoner is not entitled to the appointment of counsel or simply rejects the State's officer of appointment, the 180 day period applies to all capital cases if the State is subject to this subchapter.

In death penalty jurisdictions, the sole incentive for a prisoner initiate post-conviction review is either the scheduling of an execution date or the threat to schedule one. The disadvantages to this method of administering capital litigation persuaded the Committee to recommend the mandatory stay of execution provisions in section 2257. But it is clear that there must be some substitute mechanism to cause understandably reluctant state prisoners to seek post-conviction review when such action may remove the only obstacle preventing the State from carrying out the death sentence.

The entry of an order under section 2256(c) is such a substitute. It begins the running of the filing period in capital litigation. Unless the state prisoner actively litigates his case after his conviction and capital sentence have become final on direct appeal, he risks losing the right to file a section 2254 petition in federal court. Thus, the 180 day filing requirement serves the state interest in promoting finality in capital cases. At the same time, this subchapter serves to advance that interest only if the State provides prisoners under capital sentence with the means—competent counsel at state expense—to assert their legal rights in state post-conviction proceedings. As stressed earlier, the interaction of sections 2256, 2257 and 2258 is designed not to produce finality through procedural default but rather through a structured process of post-conviction litigation that brings all potentially meritorious claims to the attention of the state and federal courts before the imposition of the death penalty becomes legally permissible.

There are several important tolling rules in section 2258. With one exception the filing period does not run after the filing of a section 2256(c) order as long as a capital case is pending for consideration before a court of competent jurisdiction. The policy underlying section 2258 is to encourage litigants to initiate the post-conviction review process and to keep it moving from stage to stage. If delay in the litigation process is due to slow judicial consideration of death penalty litigation, that time obviously should not be and is not counted in computing the 180 day period under section 2258.

Under section 2258(a), the 180 day period is tolled when a state prisoner files a petition for certiorari in the Supreme Court after affirmance of his capital sentence on direct appeal to the state court of last resort. It is extremely important to recognize, as section 2258(b) makes clear, that there is no comparable tolling rule to permit the filing of certiorari petitions after state post-conviction review. The Committee believes that multiple opportunities for Supreme Court review are not essential to fairness in the consideration of capital cases. In this vein, it would point out that of the 106 capital cases in which the Supreme Court has granted certiorari since 1972, only 2 came to the Court from state post-conviction review. Elimination of this step does not result in disadvantage to the state prisoner, since all issues raised in state post-conviction review can be carried forward in a section 2254 petition and ultimately presented to the Supreme Court.

The filing period is also tolled under section 2258(b) during any period that a capital case is pending for post-conviction review before a state court of competent jurisdiction. After all state post-conviction review has been completed, including review by the court of last resort, the 180 day period begins to run again if the capital sentence is undisturbed. The next step for the state prisoner is to file a section 2254 petition in federal district court. If counsel for the state prisoner properly discharges his responsibilities, default under the 180 day rule will not occur.

In the event that counsel experiences some difficulty in filing a section 2254 petition on time, subsection (c) authorizes a 60 day extension upon a showing of good cause in the federal district that would have jurisdiction over the section 2254 petition when ultimately filed.

Section 2259. Evidentiary hearings; scope of federal review; district court adjudication.—

(a) Whenever a state prisoner under a capital sentence files a petition for habeas corpus relief to which this subchapter applies, the district court shall:

(1) determine the sufficiency of the evidentiary record for habeas corpus review based on the claims actually presented and litigated in the state courts except when the prisoner can show that the failure to raise or develop a claim in the state courts is (A) the result of state action in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States; (B) the result of the Supreme Court recognition of a new federal right that is retroactively applicable; or (C) based on a factual predicate that could not have been discovered through the exercise of reasonable diligence in time to present the claim for state post-conviction review; and

(2) conduct any requested evidentiary hearing necessary to complete the record for habeas corpus review.

(b) Upon the development of a complete evidentiary record, the district court shall rule on the merits of the claims properly before it.

Comment: Subsection (a) defines the scope of federal review in capital cases to which this subchapter applies. It authorizes the district court to consider only those federal claims actually raised and litigated in the state courts. If the section 2254 petition presents no new claims, the district court will proceed to rule on the merits of the claims properly before it as long as the state evidentiary record and findings of fact are adequate. If they are deficient in any respect recognized under section 2254(d), the district court must complete the evidentiary record before addressing the issues on the merits. To this extent, subsection (a) does not depart from existing law and practice.

If a petitioner asserts a claim not previously presented to the state courts, the district court can consider the claim only if one of the three exceptions to the general rule listed in subsection (a)(1) is applicable. In that case, the district court must conduct an evidentiary hearing necessary to a full and fair consideration of the claim and in accordance with subsection (b) adjudicate it on the merits along with all other issues presented in the section 2254 petition.

As far as new or "unexhausted" claims are concerned, section 2259 represents a change in the exhaustion doctrine as articulated in Rose v. Lundy, 455 U. S. 509 (1982). Section 2259 bars such claims from consideration unless one of the subsection (a)(1) exceptions is applicable. The prisoner cannot return to state court to exhaust even if he would like to do so. On the other hand, if a subsection (a)(1) exception is applicable, the district court is directed to conduct an evidentiary hearing and to rule on the new claim without first exhausting state remedies as Rose v. Lundy now requires. Because of the existence of state procedural default rules, exhaustion is futile in the great majority of cases. It serves the state interest of comity in theory, but in practice it results in delay and undermines the state interest in the finality of its criminal convictions. The Committee believes that the States would prefer to see post-conviction litigation go forward in capital cases, even if that entails a minor subordination of their interest in comity as it is expressed in the exhaustion doctrine.

Section 2260. Certificate of probable cause inapplicable.—The requirement of a certificate of probable cause in order to appeal from the district court to the court of appeals does not apply to habeas corpus cases subject to the provisions of this subchapter except when a second or successive petition is filed.

Comment: The premise of this subchapter is that a state prisoner under capital sentence is entitled to one opportunity for state and federal post-conviction review before being subject to execution. Consistent with this premise, the Committee believes that in a section 2254 proceeding, a state prisoner should be allowed to appeal from the district court to the court of appeals as a matter of right. With one exception, section 2260 eliminates the certificate of probable cause requirement in cases to which this subchapter is applicable. The exception arises when a second or successive petition is filed. Even if such a petition is authorized under the provisions of section 2257(c), the right to appeal in that instance will be governed by section 2253 rather than section 2260.

By Ms. MIKULSKI:

S. 1761. A bill to establish a national center for information and technical assistance relating to all types of family resource and support programs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

FAMILY RESOURCE ACT

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I am very pleased to introduce today a significant bill aimed at informing the Nation, and the world, about the good things being done for American families by American families. Mr. President, we all know too well the statistics about how the American family has changed over the last few decades.

Hardly a week goes by without the media focusing on how families are changing in our country. But we rarely hear about how our families are successfully adapting to the changes besetting them and their communities.

Well, in fact families have been in the forefront of developing services and programs to help themselves and other families to alleviate the stress and isolation they often face. Families in communities all across the country have increasingly come together to create community-based parent education and support services. These programs constitute what has come to be commonly referred to as the "family resource and support" movement.

It is the family resource and support movement which I am here to tell you about today. More importantly, I am today introducing a bill aimed at getting the word out around the country about this movement. I should note here that I am especially pleased that families and community and State leaders in my home State of Maryland are in the vanguard in this exciting movement.

Let's step back for a moment, first, and look at why such a movement has developed in this country. The families in our country are changing. These changes include the continually increasing numbers of mothers working outside the home; changes in family structure brought about by divorce, remarriage, and single parenthood, especially among teenagers; growing geographic mobility of families; and spiralling poverty among children, particularly in female-headed households.

The result of these changes often is isolation and frustration within families, placing them at risk of a range of social problems. Traditional social institutions, both public and private, have been slow to respond to the changes in family life, to the needs within families, and to their potentially costly and long-term repercussions. For the most part, the delivery of social services to families in the United States continues to operate on a casualty-based, crisis-driven system. Resources are primarily devoted to treating existing, well-defined problems rather than building the capacity of families to avoid problems or to deal effectively with them at an early stage.

Virtually no supportive services are available to children or parents in the critical years before a child enters school, even though research and experience indicate strongly that much of a child's important physical, social, and intellectual development occurs in these early years. This is the period in which positive support to parents in the form of parenting education, child development information, peer support, and links to other community services can increase parents' confidence and competence in their job of being parents. Their children in turn benefit from improved child rearing practices and a more secure and nurturing home environment.

In response to this unmet need for supportive services, families in communities across the country have organized family resource and support programs to help themselves. These programs are significantly and deliberately different from traditional social service programs. Rather than focusing on a limited and carefully circumscribed group of families who are in the midst of severe problems, family resource and support programs reach out to all families in the community, with the goal of helping them function better so as to enhance their quality of life and avoid or lessen problems which might develop later.

Family resource and support programs exist in a range of settings, including community centers, schools, the workplace, or wherever it is convenient for families to meet. In some cases, traditional social service agencies—child care centers, community mental health agencies, Head Start programs, or health clinics—have added family resource and support components to their existing program.

Family resource and support programs also differ fundamentally from traditional social service programs in their interaction with participants. The services they offer begin with and build on a family's strengths, seeking to empower families to meet their own needs. As a result, parents are closely involved in setting the direction of a family resource and support program and work as partners with program staff.

Several State government agencies—including my home State of Maryland's Department of Human Resources—have recognized the potential of family resource and support programs for assisting parents at an early point, thereby avoiding family crises and problems which State agencies would later have to address.

These family support centers are prevention oriented drop in programs that serve young parents and their children from birth to age three. All of the centers target teen parents because they, and their children, are most vulnerable to the negative consequences of early childbearing. The centers' overriding objective is to interrupt the cycle of poverty among young parents and their children by preventing additional pregnancies, encouraging, and—whenever possible—enabling them to complete their education, acquire job skills, and increase their parenting competencies and confidence. To achieve the center's objectives, participants and staff plan a combination of structured and unstructured activities. At the core of all the services is a focus on enhancing child development.

Mr. President, there is no better investment we could make with our national resources. In order to assure the development of effective family resource and support programs within communities wanting to develop such programs, the bill I am introducing today would create a national center whose primary goal is to promote the establishment of model family resource and support programs around the country. The national center would promote the development of family resource and support programs in two key ways. First, the national center would establish a clearinghouse to systemically identify, collect and disseminate information on all types of family resource and support programs around the country. I want to point out here that a seemingly small but essential function of this clearinghouse is to inform individual parents either of existing family resource and support programs within their communities or to provide training and technical assistance to them in setting up such a program in their community if one does not already exist.

The second important task of the national center is to identify different types of model family resource and support programs. The purpose of this task is to work with the model program administrators to develop training and technical assistance materials and seminars for use by other communities in setting up such model programs.

Finally, this bill would also mandate the conduct of evaluations of the various types of family resource and support programs. Evaluations of these programs are critical for informing both practitioners and policymakers about which types of programs are most effective in order to direct future investments in these exciting programs.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1761

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Family Resource Act".

S.J. Res. 215. Joint resolution acknowledging the sacrifices that military families have made on behalf of the Nation and designating November 30, 1989, as "National Military Families Recognition Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL MILITARY FAMILIES RECOGNITION DAY

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I am introducing legislation to designate November 20, 1989, as "National Military Families Recognition Day."

Military families deserve special recognition for the sacrifices and hardships which affect each family member. Periodic and extended separations from their military members, whether it be husband, wife, or child, is the norm. Military personnel are reassigned every 2 years. This means that the families are continually moving, thereby limiting job opportunities for spouses and limiting their ability to establish roots in any community. Military children must readjust to new school systems and new surroundings only to be uprooted once again.

As of March 1989, nearly 1.2 million active duty personnel were married out of a military force of 2 million. Dependents now total approximately 3 million. From these numbers, it is obvious to see what a significant impact these families have on our Nation's defense.

This resolution would set aside one special day to pay tribute to these military families and the contributions that they make toward our Nation's defense. We owe a special debt of gratitude to these supportive military families and the role that they play in maintaining a happy, healthy environment for our service members at home and abroad. I applaud their dedication.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort and to cosponsor my joint resolution designating November 20, 1989, as "National Military Families Recognition Day."●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

WILLISTON, VT, VOLUNTEER FIRE DEPARTMENT

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I read this wonderful article about the Williston, VT, Volunteer Fire Department that appeared in one of our local newspapers. This is one of many volunteer fire departments throughout the State of Vermont, and is the backbone of what community spirit in small-town America is all about. I am extremely proud of the men and women who take the time to keep this spirit alive and commend them on a job well done.

I ask that the article from the Burlington Free Press be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

ANSWERING THE CALL: WILLISTON VOLUNTEERS SAVE LIFE DURING CELEBRATION

(By Mai Maki)

The volunteers at the Williston Fire Department thought they were getting Saturday night off to celebrate their 40th anniversary at the Sheridan Inn in South Burlington.

But before the evening was over they were back in action, doing what they've been doing for four decades, saving a life.

Just before the firefighters' dinner celebration broke up about 8:30 p.m., a woman stumbled into the lobby of the Sheridan asking the desk clerk to call her an ambulance. She collapsed shortly after telling workers there that she had taken an overdose of pills.

The firefighters, trained as emergency medical technicians, forced air into her lungs and revived her. She was then taken to Medical Center Hospital of Vermont by the University of Vermont Rescue, where she was being examined late Saturday night.

Earlier in the night, four or five of the firefighters' scanners had crackled and squawked, calling on the Williston Fire Department to put out a chimney fire on Country Crossing, but the firefighters would not let their celebration be interrupted. They'd arranged for the Richmond Fire Department to mind the shop in their absence.

From 5:30 to 8:30 p.m. the Williston crew had a brief rest from the 180 calls a year they answer. They spent the time swapping stories and memories.

The department was founded in 1949 by two Williston residents who raised $18,000 for a fire truck and twice asked the town to accept their service—the town refused the first time around. Since then it has grown to include 25 members and more than half a dozen trucks.

In the interim, the Williston department has seen many changes, but has remained the same in many ways.

For instance, it has remained under the command of co-founder Howard Lunderville.

"The camaraderie is still there, always the same, but the learning and teaching and the techniques have changed and advanced so much," Williston Fire Department Sgt. Mike Murray said.

Robert Kilpeck, president of the Vermont Firefighters' Association, said the amount of training a firefighter must undergo has increased dramatically over the past few decades—from one general course to five courses.

"You just can't go in and fight them anymore the way you used to. Construction is more complicated and with all of these synthetic materials, you have to learn a lot more special techniques," Murray said.

Gov. Madeleine Kunin attended the celebration to thank the fire department "on behalf of all of the people in Vermont that depend on volunteer firefighters."

"You really represent the best in your field. Forty years isn't bad," she said, " . . . You are only volunteers in that you give your time, but you are very professional in every other aspect and in the level of your service."

Chief Donald Sutton of St. Michael's Fire and Rescue, vice president of the Vermont Firefighters' Association, praised the department for its service to Williston, saying it was in the spirit of former U.S. President John F. Kennedy's call to community service.

"You are the 10 percent of your town who are the people who care. We in the fire and rescue service are very special breed," he said.●

SOVIET FAMILY WISHES TO EMIGRATE

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to bring to the attention of my colleagues the seemingly endless plight of a family in the Soviet Union which yearns to leave that country. Today, Norbert and Natalia Magazanik awoke and began the 12th year of their continuing battle to receive permission from Soviet authorities to be allowed to emigrate from the Soviet Union.

During recent years, the Magazanik family had looked with renewed hopes as Mikhail Gorbachev's policy of perestroika provided many Jews who desire to emigrate from the Soviet Union that most precious of documents—an exit visa. However, these hopes have been dashed. Clearly, the exit gates have not been fully opened.

Norbert Magazanik is a cardiologist. He was a Deputy Medical Director of a Hospital in Moscow but had to leave that position when he applied for permission to emigrate. Natalia is an engineer. They have two children, Olga and Alexander.

Natalia recently conducted a hunger strike to protest the second recent refusal by the Moscow City Court of their request to emigrate. The Magazanik family has been trying to obtain such permission for 12 years, but Natalia continues to be refused on grounds that she has had access to classified information over 20 years ago.

Natalia graduated from the School of Engineering in 1962, and worked as a chemical engineer at the Institute of Glass from 1955 to 1965. In 1965 she started working for the All-Union Research Institute of the State Patent Expertise. In 1974, Natalia left the Institute; since then has not had access to classified information.

The Magazaniks are in a desperate situation. Professionally, Natalia is working as a secretary at a housing committee, while Norbert is working as a general practioner in a private clinic. He and Natalia are both being deprived of the types of work in which they could make their greatest contributions.

The family lives from day to day without knowing whether their ultimate dream of being allowed to emigrate will come true. This has taken a great emotional toll on them.

In April 1989, the Magazaniks received yet another refusal and were also told they could not reapply for permission to emigrate until November 1990.

I call on the Soviet authorities to grant the Magazaniks that which they want so dearly—the chance to live their lives in the country of their choice. There have been many welcome changes in Soviet policies recently, changes which have intimately touched the lives of many people. I call upon the Soviet authorities to make one more change, one which is long overdue.●

COSPONSORING S. 1577

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor S. 1577, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code [IRC] of 1986 to provide that charitable contributions of appreciated property will not be treated as an item of tax preference in the alternative minimum tax [AMT].

Prior to enactment of the 1986 act, deductions for charitable contributions of appreciated property did not give rise to a minimum tax preference. Current law, however, includes such contributions under the AMT, but allows only the deduction of the amount donors originally paid for the work of art, rather than its current market value, which is typically far higher.

The consequences of the 1966 act on donations of appreciated property, principally works of art, has been dramatic. It is estimated that from 1987 to 1988 donations of art works to large museums dropped from $94.6 million to $67.1 million, a decrease of over 29 percent. Similarly, over the same period small and medium-sized museums suffered a drop of almost 33 percent, from $38.8 million to $26 million. These figures demonstrate an alarming trend which threatens to grow worse.

Museums have historically depended heavily on the public spiritedness of donors of art, in addition to a wise tax policy that facilitates charitable gifts. As the Code is presently constituted, however, potential donors are dissuaded from committing works of art to the public domain. If this trend continues, museums nationwide will begin to slow but certain decline—a decline from which we would all suffer.

I urge my colleagues to join in this effort to remedy a clear problem. American wants a vibrant and healthy museum community. This measure will significantly further that end.●

"PRUDENCE" OR PARALYSIS?

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, Sunday's Washington Post ran a superb article titled "Panama: How America Lost Its Will to Act," by former Assistant Secretary of State Elliot Abrams. His idea, simply put, is that the recent, botched opportunity in Panama is symptomatic of a broader state of mind in Congress and the administration: An extreme aversion to risk, a bias in favor of inaction and passivity, a state of mind that says "When in doubt do nothing, and stay in doubt all the time." I realize that there is a broad spectrum of opinion in this body regarding Mr. Abrams, but pay attention to the message not the messenger. His message is right on the money.

By all means, we must be prudent in our foreign policy, but let us not make a cult of prudence as the be all and—too often—the end all, the reason for saying no, the rationalization for doing nothing. Let us remember that failure to act is itself a form of action, with real consequences. Likewise, failure to make a decision is itself a kind of negative decision, with real consequences. For confirmation on this score, ask the widows of the Panamanians who sought our aid in ousting Noriega.

Whether in Congress, in the bureaucracy, or in the White House, "prudence" has become the mask for passivity and paralysis. Yet this is a patently false brand of "prudence." The great Presidents of our past would remind us that there is also such a thing as prudent risk taking and prudent boldness, even—to coin an oxymoron—prudent recklessness. Indeed, it is exactly these qualities that we call leadership.

Mr. President, I ask that Mr. Abrams article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Oct. 15, 1989]

PANAMA: HOW AMERICA LOST ITS WILL TO ACT

(By Elliott Abrams)

Behind the latest Panama debacle lies a much deeper problem, one that afflicts nearly every agency and institution of the United States government: We have evolved over the last 15 years a system in which it is much easier to resist action than to act, and in which the penalties for action far exceed those for inaction.

Panama shows how this paralysis has intimidated our national-security agencies. It's the latest chapter in a story that began for the military with Vietnam and for the CIA with the Church committee investigation in 1975-76.

Under Ronald Reagan, and apparently under George Bush, the Joint Chiefs of Staff have opposed the use of force in Panama. They were willing to step aside and let the CIA act, let Treasury undertake an economic blockade or let State run off to the Organization of American States for help.

In the Reagan administration, the JCS fought for this position with every weapon in the Washington arsenals: delay, obfuscation, gross exaggeration of the military threat from the Panama Defense Force, leaks of sensitive White House meetings and plain contempt for the civilians who disagreed. While I, from my post at the State Department, deeply disagreed, I also sympathized: The chiefs knew that plans can easily go astray and did not care to be left holding the bag if the civilians ducked for cover. They rightly assumed that the political aftermath a U.S. invervention might be bloodier than the battle itself.

The CIA's wounds are even fresher and arguably deeper. I was fascinated to read in the press that the first reaction of the CIA agents told of the Panama coup plan by its plotters was "Don't kill Noriega!" Not "Where's your support?" or "How's your operational security?" or "How can we help?" but "Don't kill Noriega." And it is said that that advice may well explain why the plotters did not do so, only to be killed instead by Noriega hours later.

Now why would skilled CIA field agents respond that way? Perhaps because they were thinking not about Manuel Antonio Noriega, but instead about Joseph Fernandez, the former CIA station chief in Costa Rica. Fernandez is now under indictment by the Iran-contra special prosecutor for allegedly giving illegal aid to the contras—an object lesson in the dangers of sticking your neck out.

Without violating rules of secrecy, it is possible to say that any coup against Noriega ran the risk of resulting in his death; and killing a head of government is a violation of a U.S. executive order, respect for which the Senate Intelligence Committee has repeatedly stressed. So for CIA agents, the gain from a possible successful coup may have seemed microscopic compared with the risk of hearings, investigations ("What did the chief of station know and when did he know it?"), and even criminal indictments were Noriega to lose his life in such a coup. Moreover, the success would be institutional, or national; the indictment would be awfully personal. Result: caution and inaction.

Indeed, this sort of caution—political caution, not professional caution—has hampered CIA activity in Panama over the last year. If intelligence was short on the day of the coup, I for one would blame the guys on the Intelligence Committee rather than those in the CIA. But the point here is not Panama; instead, it is that once again inaction is made safe and attractive because the potential costs of action are raised so high.

It is in this context that bashing President Bush over Panama is unfair. Whatever the administration's failure of policy or will, and I believe both were ingredients in the fiasco, there is blame to share for literally everyone over Panama, not least the Reagan administration in which I served, and there is a far more serious problem in getting action out of our institutions.

Two examples will help explain what has caused this gridlock. First, the organization of the Congress. Long gone are the days in which Sam Rayburn, Lyndon Johnson and a handful of committee chairmen could make deals that settled business quickly and efficiently. When I arrived on the Hill in the 1970s as a Senate staffer, chairmen such as Richard Russell of the Armed Services Committee and Scoop Jackson (my boss) of the Interior Committee did not simply throw their weight around and intimidate the bureaucrats: They actually wrote legislation and made sure the public's business was completed. The Foreign Relations Committee regularly passed foreign-aid budgets and State Department authorization bills on time.

The turning point probably came in the 1970s, when mark-ups were ordered out of the back rooms and into public, so that grandstanding became more common than problem-solving. Can it be an accident that while Congress fails to formulate a fiscal policy for the country, the Federal Reserve Board, which does it work in secret, maintains a sensible monetary policy?

These days, authorization bills may never get passed, the continuing resolution has become a fixture, and indeed it has become just about impossible to pass a national budget. Congress has created the budget committees, whose failure to solve the problem then led to Gramm-Rudman, whose failure will lead God knows where.

Surely the atomization of power into endless lists of subcommittees was another fatal step, eroding the power of anyone to get anything done. What was once a well-organized feudal system now seems closer to an anarchist's dream.

The incredible proliferation of Hill staffers, their numbers tripling during the '70s, adds spice to the poison. As an ex-staffer, I well remember the delight we took in tossing bombs into the executive agencies; and when the negative work was done, there was always the task of dreaming up new laws that just had to be passed.

The high number of staffers, far from aiding members, reduces their control over their own affairs and those of their institution. Moreover, it means that much public business is in the hands of young people whose agenda have little to do with making our institutions work, with comity, with compromise—in a word, with politics in the sense of representing voters by getting their business done. If there is a particular art form that represents the contribution of the Hill staffer to our culture, it is the accusatory hearing, wherein administration officials are abused for the edification of the public in the modern pillory we call C-SPAN.

But as Congress reorganized itself so as to render its own efficient action impossible, a second development—a different kind of politics—led it and the executive to claw at each other in ways that make both branches less effective. As the Democrats gained seemingly permanent control of the Hill, while Republicans kept winning the White House, excessive partisanship came to suffuse interbranch rivalries.

Rivalry between these two branches is part of the constitutional scheme. That rivalry, however, has histocially been tempered when one house's majority is loyal to a president of the same party, or, more importantly, by each party's knowledge that it will soon enough switch control of branches with the other. But since the late '60s, the Democrats have basically fought executive power while the Republicans have grasped it, and traditional interbranch rivalry has become a nasty, sometimes vicious brawl.

Nowadays, it isn't enough to defeat an administration's policy goals, or even to get someone fired: The scent of blood is in the air, and political opponents are viewed as enemies who deserve to have their lives ruined. And if all else fails to produce the sought result, there's always the rumor mill: I well remember the Senate Foreign Relations Committee staffer who traveled to Mexico in the spring of 1987, when I was assistant secretary of state and Iran-contra was young, and told the embassy staff that I would be indicted in a matter of weeks. I never received an apology from her, or from the senator who employs her. Such is war.

The effects are personal, in that the players in these battles are people, but they are institutional as well. This fierce, even vicious partisanship makes cooperation in the conduct of the public's business difficult, and sometimes impossible. While neither branch can act without the other on domestic and even most foreign policy matters, both have endless opportunities for sniping, blocking, recriminating and other sports.

Action can often be stopped—by withholding funding, or calling hearings, or launching investigations, for example—or, if that doesn't work, the people who undertake the action can be punished for their temerity. Colleagues of embattled officials learn that pushing through a controversial program is dangerous indeed: There are so many object lessons walking around nowadays that any sane official thinks twice before undertaking any controversial action. Safer to let the in-box pile up, and tell Senator X that, no, action on that project was never contemplated.

There have been moments of action in recent years, exceptions that prove the rule. First, a strong president can blast his way through, as Ronald Reagan did in his first term. What is required is a big electoral victory, a clear program, energy and guts. Thus did Reagan prevail against the air traffic controllers, bomb Libya, invade Grenada, arm the contras and cut taxes. And it must be said that in all of this he captured, by symbolizing and transmuting into a political agenda, the national mood. For a related, second exception to the rule of paralysis is that Americans will respond when pushed too far. In the 1970s, they were pushed too far by Soviet expansionism, and by the growing intrusiveness and expense of government at home.

So a mood can develop, and be exploited, to permit quite impressive action. But such occurrences really are exceptions. They require awfully good timing in the meeting of candidate and popular sentiment, and demand that the candidate's energy not flag when he is president. For the resistence will be fierce and sooner or later every president becomes a lame duck. Reagan II, his second term, was no replica of Reagan I.

Optimists would argue that this is no problem, much less a crisis, for only with extremely strong public support should a president be able to redirect so much of public policy so quickly. Today, with the growth of government reduced, with Gorbachev's reforms replacing Brezhnev's expansionism, who needs an activist administration? Who needs to unleash the CIA, or goose the Joint Chiefs? Who cares who lost Panama, and who wanted Panama in the first place?

There's an element of truth underlying this Pollyanna-ish analysis, for our system's current loginess is no proof it would not respond to a major push from within our borders or without. You didn't need Franklin Roosevelt to react to Pearl Harbor. But this view begs the question, which is not how we conduct public business during rare moments of national crisis, but whether, without such unusual stimuli, the system works. Can the system wake itself up without special injections of adrenalin?

I doubt it. The system of checks and balances has been replaced by a system of checks and cross-checks. It is in fact this phenomenon that is cited by the unusual number of members of Congress who have quit in frustration in recent years, and it is the standard experience of policymakers. It is just so damn hard to get anything done. Moreover, as then-secretary of state George Shultz pointed out a couple of years ago, even if something does get done, the issue is never settled and you fight over the same matter year after year.

After a false good start, the replacement of Reagan-Byrd-Wright with Bush-Mitchell-Foley has had no real impact. If there are "solutions" to the impasse problem, they are not exactly quickies: Have Congress reconcentrate power in fewer hands; have a president and a Congress of the same party; decriminalize political disputes. Prayer is more likely to provide prompt relief.

Let's hope the optimistic are right: In a crisis we'll all hang together, and meanwhile, relax. Italy has done very well without a functioning government for decades. Anyway, our economy is okay and the Soviets are preoccupied with their own political and economic implosion. If this is the End of History, who needs Lyndon Johnson and Sam Rayburn?

The trouble is, we'll find out too late whether they are right or not. The Noriega blip showed us our radar screen isn't working and our maintenance procedures are flawed. We may be learning habits of government that are too deeply ingrained to throw out instantly in a crisis; we may be teaching officials self-protective modes of behavior that will control their actions even in a crisis; we may be building national security apparatuses unable to respond as we would like if the Soviets decide they like having an empire after all. Suppose, that is, that history decides not to end?

Bashing Bush won't help here, and getting rid of Noriega would just barely scratch the surface of the problems that confront us. Still, you've got to start somewhere.●

REPORT OF AMERICAN PANEL ON UNESCO

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, last Friday I submitted to the attention of my colleagues a report of the United Nations Association-USA investigating the United States' interests in the activities of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, otherwise known as UNESCO. I noted that much has changed since the United States withdrew from UNESCO in 1984. Indeed, so much has changed that the United States is now carefully considering whether to rejoin the organization.

Last April I presided over hearings on this question. The issues are difficult. UNESCO has tremendous potential for good. But its prior leadership had aligned with those who wished to suppress, not promote, the free flow of information under the guise of a "New World Information Order." It suffered from a host of ills. It had become politicized.

Today the United Nations Association released the second part of its study, which directly addresses the question of whether UNESCO has changed enough to justify a decision by the United States to rejoin its ranks. In this the distinguished panel which prepared the report has performed an admirable service. They analyze the issues with intelligence and care. Under the leadership of our distinguished former colleague, Robert Stafford of Vermont, the UNA-USA panel reached the following conclusion: Assuming this fall's general conference demonstrates its confidence in the new Director-General Frederico Mayor's leadership by approving the substance of his medium-term plan, the U.S. panel recommends that the United States resume its membership in UNESCO early in 1990.

I commend the panel for its efforts and I strongly urge my colleagues to examine the full body of the panel's recommendations on this important issue. Mr. President, at this time I ask that the conclusions of the United Nations Association-USA panel be printed in the RECORD.

The conclusions follow:

A FORUM IN RESTORATION

(Summary of Findings of the Report of the American Panel on UNESCO)

Nearly five years have passed since the United States left UNESCO. The shock of U.S. withdrawal has given the other industrialized democracies considerable leverage in pressing for reform in the organization. Today, with new leadership under Director-General Federico Mayor, and with a new program plan attuned to the world's intellectual and professional communities, the agency is certainly more hospitable to Western ideas than seemed the case in the decade. At this crucial moment for the direction of the organization, the United States must decide whether its interests will be better served by participating in UNESCO's work or by staying outside it.

The fundamental question is whether UNESCO's activities are important enough that Americans should even care about shaping the organization's direction. First, are these activities relevant to, and do they have an impact on, America's wide-ranging interests—in science, culture, education, human rights, and communication? Second, are U.S. political objectives affected by UNESCO's actions? Has the agency made progress in remedying the problems that the U.S. government cited as causes for American withdrawal? A corollary to this is the tactical question: If the United States does wish to press for additional reform of UNESCO, will continued nonparticipation strengthen or weaken American influence in the organization? How should the U.S. structure its participation in UNESCO if it decides to resume its membership?

America's intellectual and professional communities are key to the nation's continued competitive edge in world affairs. The U.S. panel asked a broad spectrum of American nongovernmental organizations in these communities to assess UNESCO's work and deficiencies. The finding: UNESCO's work is relevant to these organizations' purposes; the agency's management under the last director-general was UNESCO's biggest problem, followed by the intrusion of political controversies; and with the reform program initiated by Director-General Mayor now under way, the U.S. should renew its participation.

Taking UNESCO's program sectors one by one and examining American interests and needs in each, the U.S. panel found:

UNESCO has considerable importance to America's scientific community. It allows American scientists the access to research and observational sites worldwide that is essential to their own pioneering work, and it promotes global scientific inquiry into common problems. The most urgent problems facing world science today are those relating to the natural environment—an area in which UNESCO has done groundwork for decades.

UNESCO could be useful in addressing a number of problems confronting American education, and it is clearly important for disseminating America's democratic educational ideas abroad. UNESCO's work in literacy in developing countries—where improvement in education is essential for economic and political development and, thus, for peace and stability—promotes a historic American interest.

UNESCO has a unique and important role in promoting cultural diversity and, with its World Heritage program, preserving mankind's cultural patrimony—something that is of keen interest to many Americans. The organization is charged with protecting the cultural freedom of creative people and, as administrator of the Universal Copyright Convention, is a forum for addressing infringements of their economic rights as well.

UNESCO is the international system's lead agency in shaping communication policy, with implications for the enhancement, or limitation, of the free flow of information. U.S. participation in the global information debate is crucial for the successful advocacy of freedom of ideas and will help to assure that legitimate concerns about the distribution of communication capabilities around the world do not result in assertions of any form of control over the information being communicated.

UNESCO's growing role as a clearinghouse for communication technologies makes it valuable to a U.S. telecommunications industry now competing for access to markets in the developing countries.

UNESCO's human rights program is useful in deepening respect for human rights on a universal basis—helping root individual liberties and rights and gender and racial equality in the life and culture of societies worldwide.

The United States has a range of political interests that are affected by UNESCO, beginning with the nation's enduring interest in preserving the multilateral system in which UNESCO is a founding partner. Certainly the U.S. absence from the international agency that deals with education, science, and culture-areas in which Americans have been so often at the forefront—is something of an aberration. Furthermore, when a political issue does arise in a U.N. agency (the admission of a would-be member state was one such issue in 1989), the U.S. absence can have repercussions for American political interests.

When the United States withdrew from UNESCO, it made a threefold indictment: (1) The organization was badly managed; (2) it was embarked on excessive budgetary growth; (3) its activities had become highly politicized and divisive. Since 1984 the organization has made some clear and undeniable progress in correcting all three problems:

1. Organization and Personnel Management. By the early 1980s virtually all decision-making had been centralized within the Director-General's office, depriving even the top program managers of effective authority for their own programs—most visibly with respect to hiring. Management reform has been one of the major priorities of the new Director-General. Returning to UNESCO's program directors the effective authority for their own programs, including hiring, he has commissioned an outside review of the agency's administration. To date there has been clear progress in replacing patronage with professionalism.

2. Budgetary Growth. In the early 1980s, when major contributors were attempting to freeze U.S. agency spending levels, the UNESCO secretariat and representatives of developing countries pressed for substantial increases in real money terms, which the U.S. found unacceptable. With the loss of U.S. and British funding in mid-decade, UNESCO was forced to make deep and painful budget cuts. After four years of zero growth on this shrunken base, Director-General Mayor has requested 2.5 percent growth in real money terms for 1990-91, although in June 1989 the Executive Board, a key UNESCO governing body, failed to endorse any increase at all. Clearly runaway budget growth is no longer a fact at UNESCO.

3. Politicization. The frequent introduction of politically charged issues into UNESCO operations, more than any other factor, alienated key segments of the American public. After the pullout by the United States and the United Kingdom, the suggestion that Japan, West Germany, and others might do the same helped to persuade a majority of delegates that the secretariat required new leadership. There is now ample evidence that politicization of issues has eased in the deliberations of the governing bodies, and the 1989 General Conference may offer further proof of this change.

On the communications controversy, the Third World has moderated its position over the past decade. Still, for many Americans the way this issue is resolved will be a litmus test, indicating whether the organization's governing bodies have indeed turned away from polarizing political posturing to achievement-oriented problem-solving. This more balanced and constructive approach needed to renew UNESCO's dynamism should be evidence at the 25th General Conference this fall.

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS ABOUT U.S. PARTICIPATION IN UNESCO

The U.S. panel concludes that under the leadership of Federico Mayor, UNESCO seems headed on the right track. Reversing the condition of rigor mortis that set in with sterile political debates and patronage and had alienated even the professional communities it was intended to serve, the organization is moving vigorously to reinvolve the world's distinguished intellectual leaders of the nonstate sector in a dynamic, practical program that addresses humanity's urgent needs in UNESCO's special fields.

Assuming this fall's General Conference demonstrates its confidence in Mayor's leadership by approving the substance of his medium-term plan, the U.S. panel recommends that the United States resume its membership in UNESCO early in 1990.

The panel concludes that by remaining outside the agency after the General Conference has approved policy reforms the United States has long sought, America will sacrifice any credibility to press for futher reform. In short, there is no more mileage to be gained by staying out. Indeed, there is little doubt that, without an American return, the management of the organization would pass into the hands of much less congenial leaders.

If the U.S. government requires a specific signal as proof of UNESCO's sustained progress, then the administration must make clear that the United States will renew its membership if the General Conference sends that signal. To convey the seriousness of American intent, the United States should send a blue-ribbon observer delegation to the General Conference, to be led by Americans who have distinguished themselves in the several program sectors addressed by UNESCO: leading scientists, educators, cultural creators and preservationists, human rights advocates, and communication leaders.

RESTRUCTURING AMERICAN PARTICIPATION

Simply returning to UNESCO will not be enough. The U.S. panel is convinced that changed circumstances since UNESCO's founding require a reassessment of the way we organize our participation. Responsibility for American participation in the work of the other specialized agencies of the U.N. system is vested in an appropriate department of government, with State Department control over political issues and U.S. budgetary contributions. When the U.S. returns to UNESCO, the Congress should consider where the primary responsibility for coordinating U.S. substantive participation in the organization should be assigned administratively, given the specialized interests of the State Department, the Department of Education, the science agencies, and even the Smithsonian Institution.

The constitution of the U.S. National Commission for UNESCO should also be reviewed with an eye to ensuring that U.S. policymaking for UNESCO reflects the pluralism of America's varied interests in its work. Under the current law, the National Commission may have up to 100 members. The panel recommends that Congress halve its size and that two-thirds of the members be drawn from nongovernmental groups working in UNESCO's program areas. Of the remaining seats, those for federal government representatives should be allocated among key agencies by law. The panel further recommends that the reorganized commission seek extrabudgetary resources from outside the federal government to support an innovative research and outreach program.

U.S. REPRESENTATION

America's permanent delegates and its Executive Board representatives should have some familiarity with—and serious concern about—UNESCO's intellectual domains. (The panel views the two roles as distinct but compatible.) The permanent delegate to UNESCO should be chosen by the President, with advice from the National Commission. The choice of U.S. representatives for UNESCO's Executive Board is a somewhat different matter. The international panel recommends that any country's nominee for the Executive Board originate in its (predominantly nongovernmental) national commission. The U.S. panel recommends that the U.S. National Commission enter at least four names in nomination, from which the White House would select one to recommend to the General Conference as the American candidate for election to the Board.

The National Commission should also have a role in assembling the national delegation to the General Conference.

AMERICANS IN THE SECRETARIAT

During the last two decades the number of Americans employed in the UNESCO secretariat was always far below that to which the U.S. was entitled under the geographic distribution system—a "quota" based on the share of the agency budget each country is assessed.

The office of recruitment in the State Department's Bureau for International Organization Affairs is understaffed, overextended, and unable to stay in close touch with the many specialized networks through which promising candidates for UNESCO posts might be found. The reconstituted National Commission, with its expertise and contacts, should do that active recruitment in these specialized networks and in universities, taking the burden from the overwhelmed recruitment office in State.

FUNDING

Given federal deficits, the payment of some $43 million in annual dues may present difficult budgetary choices. Nonetheless, the President should include funds for the entire U.S. assessment for UNESCO when he submits the 1991 budget (for the calendar year beginning October 1990) to the Congress, and Congress should resist the urge to peck away at the needed appropriation. After five years of doubting the seriousness of the U.S. interest in UNESCO, Congress must not undercut the policy decision to return by shortchanging the organization.

This contribution must not be used to provide a windfall refund to the organization's other major contributor states, nor should be secretariat willy-nilly restore programs slashed in 1985, building in new recurring costs. Rather, the U.S. should propose (and the General Conference authorize) the creation of a special account for such new funds until the end of the biennium. These funds, to be disbursed by the Director-General with Executive Board oversight, should be used primarily for nonrecurring expenses that help to strengthen priority programs.

THE FUTURE

Despite recent progress, much needs to be done if UNESCO is to regain the intellectual stature it enjoyed in its first three decades and reclaim a leadership role in its fields of endeavor. The report of the international panel surveys a wide range of humanity's urgent needs in these fields, finds that UNESCO is in the best position or organize an effective response to such needs, and recommends far-reaching structural reform to carry it out. The accomplishment of this profound reform will require American support and American leadership.●

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 205, DESIGNATING DECEMBER 3 THROUGH 9, 1989, AS NATIONAL CITIES FIGHT BACK AGAINST DRUGS WEEK

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, Last week, the Governmental Affairs Committee held a hearing on the drug war at the State and local level. Here in Washington, we use—and overuse—the word "war" to describe the Federal contribution to drug control. At our hearing, we learned that, to State and local government officials, the "war against drugs" is more than a rhetorical device—it's a reality.

U.S. Governors and mayors face daily the cost in human dignity and human life exacted by the illegal drug trade. They receive daily body counts generated by drug-related crime. They wrestle daily with overflowing prisons and treatment centers.

We heard some shocking battle field stories from the Governors and mayors who testified before our committee. We heard of police forces outgunned by drug gangs. We heard of treatment centers too full to take on those who voluntarily would enter their programs. We heard of a town so financially strapped by its efforts to stem the drug trade that its policemen had to buy their own guns.

Wars are not glorious. They drain resources from programs for the public good. They embody violence and death—especially the death of the young.

In the District of Columbia this year alone, there have already been over 335 homicides. Almost 60 percent of these killings involved drugs. Almost 10 percent represent the murder of children under 18 years old.

We often forget this tragic side of war in our rush to turn the neatest phrase about drug policy—whether it be the Congress or the President's. Sadly, it is a side that those serving at the State and local levels cannot forget.

Today, I rise to ask that I be added as a cosponsor to Senate Joint Resolution 205. This legislation answers the National League of Cities call for Congress and the President to name a week in December "National Cities Fight Back Against Drugs Week."

This resolution will serve two purposes. The first is obvious. It will provide a fixed time when cities can bring to the attention of the Nation their efforts to stem the trade and use of drugs in their jurisdictions.

The second purpose is less obvious—but perhaps more important. The resolution sets aside a week when we in Washington can listen to what those who run our cities have to say about fighting the drug war. And, if we are to help win that war at the Federal level, we must listen.

I commend Senator BIDEN for introducing this resolution and the National League of Cities for conceiving it. I ask that my name be added as a cosponsor.●

ORDER TO PRINT S. 933

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 933, the Americans With Disabilities Act, be printed as passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

WELCOMING MEMBERS OF THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senator DOLE, I send a concurrent resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 76) welcoming Members of the Canadian Parliament on their visit to the Capitol.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being on objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no debate, the question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 76) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. CON. RES. 76

Whereas the United States and Canada share a contiguous border and equally contiguous history, having been explored and settled as European colonies, having established their national independence and self-government, and having coexisted peacefully since the founding of the Dominion of Canada in 1867;

Whereas the United States and Canada share a mutual heritage of democracy, and have allied themselves to preserve and defend their liberty and security during two world wars and other international conflicts;

Whereas the Congress of the United States and the Canadian Parliament, as legislative bodies, share an unwavering commitment to representative government under our respective constitutions;

Whereas the Congress of the United States and the Canadian Parliament for the past three decades have established and maintained regular contact and cooperation through meetings of the Canada-United States Interparliamentary Group; and

Whereas the Canadian Embassy in Washington has recently moved to a handsome new building at the base of Capitol Hill, as a new neighbor to the United States Capitol: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States welcomes and salutes the Speaker of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Commons, and other members of the Canadian Parliament on their visit to the Capitol, and reaffirms the strong ties of friendship and mutual support between our national legislatures.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS, 1990—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 3026 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 3026), making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of said District for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of October 5, 1989.)

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the conference report presented here today represents a major step forward in the District's efforts to combat drugs and crime in the Nation's Capital. The report includes many items that were part of the Senate version of the bill.

It also represents something that we don't often see around here, a balanced budget. The District is required by law to submit a balanced budget and we are required to keep it that way. We have been able to do that while also providing for significant resources to attack the District's drug epidemic.

The problems of the District are not isolated. Drugs and crime are everywhere. According to recent press reports most of the Washington suburbs have experienced marked increases in drug related crime and murders. Over the past Columbus Day/Yom Kippur weekend the District recorded its 351st murder and 19 other people were shot. During the same period the suburb of Prince Georges County recorded its 91st homicide of the year. Over the previous weekend six people were murdered in the District.

Mr. President, this conference report responds to this carnage by providing $31.8 million in additional Federal funds for the District's drug emergency. $17.5 million of these funds will be used to hire 700 new police, which will be added to the 300 contained in the District's proposed budget to return the District to its 1969 level of police officers of 5,100.

We have also found that the court system is in dire need of help to deal with the increased number of drug felons. The conference agreement includes $4.8 million for the courts. This includes funds for eight additional judges, which is subject to action by the authorizing committees. It is the conferees hope that those committees will act before this session of Congress is over in keeping with the emergency nature of the conferees action. Drug offenders must be tried and punished as swiftly as possible after arrest.

Mr. President, the conferees have included funds for drug treatment. Law enforcement is necessary to stabilize the streets but the long-term battle will not be won unless we can treat and rehabilitate addicts. The conference agreement provides $2 million to begin a program to provide treatment on demand for addicts who are preganant. Too many crack addicted babies are born in Washington, DC. Our first goal should be to try and save these innocent children. On that point, Mr. President, we have retained language included by the Senate which establishes a task force in the District's Department of Human Services which will report back within 1 year on a plan to provide services to substance abusing pregnant women and their infants.

Finally, the conferees have included $1.3 million for the DC public school system to expand after school programs particularly in high-risk neighborhoods. We have to give our children an alternative to the enticement of drug activity on the streets.

The conferees share our strong belief that we have to work with the District government to make the streets of our Capital City as safe as possible. We believe in home rule and we do not want to run the District of Columbia. But we do want to help the District of Columbia cope with this plague.

The remainder of the of the bill contains $430.5 million for the Federal payment to the District. This payment is provided to the District in lieu of the Federal Government paying property taxes on its vast land holdings in the District. This payment has not increased in 3 fiscal years, and in fact is below the fiscal year 1987 level. Since that time the cost of city services have increased by 12 percent and the Federal budget outlays have increased by 8 percent, without an increase in the Federal payment to the District.

The conference agreed to a Senate provision appropriating $8.7 million for the first quarter payment to the District for water and sewer services provided to the Federal Government. This represents a reduction of more than $26 million below the House allowance and a departure from past practice. Since 1954 the Federal Government has made a lump-sum payment to the District for these services, the conference agreement includes language authorizing the District government to begin billing and receiving payment from the various Federal agencies beginning in January 1990.

Mr. President, the Senate conferees also took the Armstrong amendment to conference. The Armstrong amendment amends the D.C. Code to make it legal in the District for any educational institution affiliated with a religious organization to discriminate against homosexuals. This amendment was prompted by a court decision involving Georgetown University. The court held that the District's Human Rights Act prohibited the university from denying use of facilities and services to homosexual student groups, while upholding the university's right to deny university recognition. The conference agreement modified it to more closely follow the court's decision.

Like the Armstrong amendment, the conference agreement would have allowed any religious educational institution to deny endorsement, approval, or recognition to those who promote sexual lifestyles contrary to its religious doctrine. The conference agreement also allowed denial of use of religious facilities and services.

Mr. President, the Armstrong amendment goes far beyond its stated intent to protect religious freedom. It allows a school to fire a teacher, or expel a student, or in fact not admit an otherwise qualified student, based on their sexual preference—a criteria that 13 States and 80 localities, including the District of Columbia, do not permit. Of course, if this provision becomes law nothing restricts the District Council's authority as it pertains to title 1 of the D.C. Code.

Mr. President, on balance this conference agreement provides a good compromise and will go a long way to attaching the drug and crime evils in the Nation's Capital. It is important that we enact this bill as soon as possible to begin to stem this tide of violence that grips this city.

Mr. President, in closing I want to express my appreciation to the Senate conferees for their attention to this bill, and to the able House conferees led by Representative JULIAN DIXON and Representative DEAN GALLO who as always represented their body with knowledge and distinction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a brief statement outlining the other highlights of the conference report, and a statement of the budgetary impact of the conference report, in compliance with section 308(a) of the Budget Act, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ADAMS ON THE CONFERENCE REPORT TO ACCOMPANY H.R. 3026 DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS BILL, 1990

Mr. President, I would like to briefly summarize the other provisions in the conference agreement. In amendments number 1 and 16 the House has agreed to provisions included by the Senate permitting the District government to bill Federal agencies directly for the cost of water and sewer services which they use. Under current law this payment is made by a lump-sum amount, the conference agreement includes $8,685,000 for the first quarter payment. This change will take place on January 1 1989 for a one year trial period at the end of which the committees will review the system in connection with the fiscal year 1991 budget request to determine the efficiency and effectiveness of this new system of billing and collecting for these services.

Amendment 2 provides an advance appropriation of $20,300,000 for fiscal year 1991 to the District of Columbia to complete the Correctional Treatment Facility being constructed in Southeast Washington. This brings to $85 million the total cost of the CTFG, $70.3 million, or 83% of the total, to be borne by the Federal government and $14.7 million, or 17%, to be borne by the District of Columbia government.

Under amendment 3 the conference agreement provides for $31,772,000 in Federal funds and $150,000 in local D.C. funds by transfer to address the Drug Emergency in the District, as recommended by the State.

Mr. President, the House also accepted amendment 21 of the Senate bill which establishes a Task Force on Substance Abusing Pregnant Women and Infants Exposed to Maternal Substance Abusing During Pregnancy in the District of Columbia Department of Human Services. The task force will report to the Congress within one year after the date of enactment of this Act at which time it will cease to exist.

Mr. President, this conference agreement includes several items that will provide the D.C. courts with additional resources to address their increasing caseloads, within the courts existing structure. These additional resources are the results of the eloquent testimony of the Chief Judges of the Court of Appeals and Superior Court, as well as the fine justification material provided to the Congress by the Executive Officer of the District of Columbia Courts, Mr. Larry P. Polansky. Mr. Polansky will retire at the end of this calendar year after more than ten years with the District's court system.

He was formerly the Deputy State Court Administrator for the State of Pennsylvania and Chief Deputy Administrator for Operations and Services at the Philadelphia Court of Common Pleas where he was responsible for a major portion of the administrative management of a large urban court and gained valuable experience that has been invaluable to the District of Columbia. Mr. Polansky's professionalism and integrity will be missed by his colleagues at the court system and his cooperative nature and energetic spirit will be missed by those in the Congress who have come to rely on him as a national leader in court administration. We wish him, and his wife Eunice, much happiness and well deserved relaxation in their future endeavors.

INSURANCE COVERAGE OF MAMMOGRAMS

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, a recent survey by the National Centers for Disease Control shows the District of Columbia ranks 15th in mortality for breast cancer. This occurrence is unnecessary and unfortunate in view of the fact that the early detection of breast cancer through routine mammography substantially reduced the mortality rate for this disease.

Mr. President, 1 in 10 American women will develop breast cancer. This year alone, the disease will claim the lives of about 43,000 American women. Scientists, however, estimate that the death rate from breast cancer would drop 30 percent if women over 40 years of age had a routine mammography. And, the treatment for breast cancer is most successful when the disease is detected early. In this regard, 90 percent of women whose cancer is found at the earliest stage can be treated successfully.

Many States are recognizing the critical role early detection plays in improving the survival rate for women with breast cancer. In fact, 24 States now require health insurance companies to cover screening mammograms for women without symptoms of breast cancer. Mr. President, this insurance trend is gaining speed; the number of States requiring coverage doubled between 1988 and 1989.

It is my understanding that the District of Columbia does not require reimbursement for mammograms. I would think, Mr. President, that a requirement of this kind in the District of Columbia would significantly reduce their high mortality rate for breast cancer.

Would the Senator from Washington agree that we should ask the District of Columbia Insurance Administration to provide us with a report outlining the impact of such a requirement on insurance providers within this jurisdiction?

Mr. ADAMS. I agree with the Senator from South Carolina. It is a tragedy that every woman, particularly those in the high-risk groups, do not have available to them the means for early detection of breast cancer. Although I do not have statistics as precise as those quoted by the Senator from South Carolina, I would also encourage the insurance administration to look into the impact and need for coverage of PAP smear's as a way to improve early detection of cervical cancer.

So, Mr. President, I would agree with the Seantor and join him in calling on the District's Insurance Administration to report to the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives and to the District of Columbia Council, so that they may perpare appropriate legislation, by January 1, 1990.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the conference report?

If not, the The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments in disagreement numbered 5, 7, 11, 16, 18, and 19 be considered and agreed to en bloc, that the motions to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were agreed to be laid upon the table en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments in disagreement numbered 5, 7, 11, 16, 18, and 19 considered and agreed to en bloc are as follows:

"(4) The amount or time period for late payment of charges for sanitary sewer services involving a building, establishment, or other place owned by the Government of the United States imposed by the District of Columbia shall not be different from those imposed by the District of Columbia on its most favored customer.".

(d) The first sentence of subsection (d) of section 207 of the District of Columbia Public Works Act of 1954 (68 Stat. 106) is amended to read as follows: "Whenever a property upon which a sanitary sewer service charge is a public park, or uses water from the water supply system of the District for an industrial or commercial purpose in such a manner that the water so used is likewise not discharged into the sanitary sewage works of the District, the quantity of water so used and not discharged into the sanitary sewage works of the District may be excluded in determining the sanitary sewer service charge on such property, if such exclusion is previously requested in writing by the owner or occupant thereof and approved in writing by the District government in advance of the billing period involved.".

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on behalf of Senators MIKULSKI, SARBANES, WARNER, and ROBB, I move to concur in the House amendment to the Senate amendment No. 15 with a further amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Maine, [Mr. MITCHELL], (for Ms. MIKULSKI) (for herself, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. ROBB), proposes an amendment numbered 1011.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

SEC. 110B. (a) APPLICATION FOR EMPLOYMENT, PROMOTIONS, AND REDUCTIONS IN FORCE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The rules issued pursuant to the amendments to the District of Columbia Government Comprehensive Merit Personnel Act of 1978 made by the Residency Preference Amendment Act of 1988 (D.C. Law 7-203) shall include the provisions described in paragraph (2).

(2) DESCRIPTION OF POLICIES.—

(A) POLICY REGARDING APPLICATION FOR EMPLOYMENT.—The Mayor of the District of Columbia may not give an applicant for District of Columbia government employment in the Career Service who claims a District residency preference more than a 5 point hiring preference over an applicant not claiming such a preference, and, in the case of equally qualified applicants, shall give an applicant claiming such a preference priority in hiring over an applicant not claiming such a preference.

(B) POLICY REGARDING PROMOTIONS AND REDUCTIONS IN FORCE FOR CAREER SERVICE EMPLOYEES.—In calculating years of service for the purpose of implementing a reduction-in-force, the Mayor may not credit an employee in the Career Service who claims a District residency preference with more than 1 year of additional service credit, and in the case of equally qualified employees, shall give an employee claiming such a preference priority in promotion over an employee not claiming such a preference.

(C) INDIVIDUALS SUBJECT TO PROVISIONS.—The amendments to the District of Columbia Government Comprehensive Merit Personnel Act of 1978 made by the Residency Preference Amendment Act of 1988 shall apply only with respect to individuals claiming a District residency preference or applying for employment with the District of Columbia on or after March 16, 1989.

(b) SCOPE OF 5-YEAR DISTRICT RESIDENCY REQUIREMENT FOR EMPLOYEES CLAIMING PREFERENCE.—

(1) CAREER SERVICE EMPLOYEES.—Section 801(e)(5) of the District of Columbia government Comprehensive Merit Personnel Act of 1978 (section 1-608.1(e)(5), D.C. Code), as amended by the Residency Preference Amendment Act of 1988 (D.C. Law 7-203), is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(7)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the Mayor may not require an individual to reside in the District of Columbia as a condition of employment in the Career Service.

"(B) The Mayor shall provide notice to each employee in the Career Service of the provisions of this subsection that require an employee claiming a residency preference to maintain District residency for 5 consecutive years, and shall only apply such provisions with respect to employees claiming a residency preference on or after March 16, 1989."

(2) EDUCATIONAL SERVICE EMPLOYEES.—Section 801A(d) of such Act (section 1-609.1(d), D.C. Code), as amended by the Residency Preference Amendment Act of 1988 (D.C. Law 7-203), is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(7)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), the Boards may not require an individual to reside in the District of Columbia as a condition of employment in the Educational Services.

"(B) The Boards shall provide notice to each employee in the Educational Service of the provisions of this subsection that require an employee claiming a residency preference to maintain District residency for 5 consecutive years, and shall only apply such provisions with respect to employees claiming a residency preference on or after March 16, 1989."

AMENDMENT CONCERNING THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I offer an amendment on behalf of myself and Senators SARBANES, ROBB, and WARNER.

Mr. President, the D.C. government initiated a residency requirement for employees of the District government in 1980. As you know, Congress responded in the fiscal year 1989 D.C. appropriations bill with a mandate to change the requirement because it created a second class of citizens composed primarily of Maryland and Virginia residents.

On January 6, 1989, the D.C. Council removed the residency requirement and adopted a preference system which became effective March 6, 1989. However, the existing preference system adopted by the Council, is essentially still a residency requirement because it is so unfair.

The existing preference provides to District residents: Gives 10 additional points to D.C. residents in hiring and promotions which is in effect a residency requirement.

The motion offered to the amendment in disagreement will keep the basic structure of the District's system but will reduce the preference to a reasonable 5 points for new hires and promotions of existing employees. A letter from Mayor Barry to Congressman HOYER dated October 3, 1989 states that he has sent to the D.C. Council rules and regulations to implement most of the modifications contained in the amendment but only for new employees.

Mr. President, there are 909 officers that are affected by the current law thereby requiring them to live in the District for 5 years after being hired. A survey conducted by the Fraternal Order of Police indicated that almost 90 percent of the 909 young officers affected indicate that unless a change is made they will quit because they may be fired unless they maintain their residence in the District. We cannot allow these brave men and women who are waging the war on drugs at the front line to be concerned with losing their job based solely on where they choose to live.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I understand the Chair has an announcement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I do.

REPLICATION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO THE ANSWER BY JUDGE WALTER L. NIXON, JR., TO THE AMENDED ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT AND BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits to the Senate for printing in the Senate Journal and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the replication of the House of Representatives to the answer by Judge Walter L. Nixon, Jr., to the amended articles of impeachment, as well as the House of Representatives' brief in support of the articles of impeachment, pursuant to Senate Resolution 127, 101st Congress, 1st Session, and the unanimous consent agreement obtained October 5, 1989, which replication and brief were received by the Secretary of the Senate on October 16, 1989.

The material follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, October 13, 1989.

Hon. WYCHE FOWLER, JR.,
Chairman, Impeachment Trial Committee, Washington, DC.

(Attention: Anthony Harvey).

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Enclosed please find the original and twelve (12) copies of the House of Representatives' Replication to Judge Nixon's Answer to the Amended Articles of Impeachment, for filing in connection with the Nixon impeachment.

Per Mr. Purdy's instructions, also enclosed is the original of the House of Representatives' Brief in Support of the Articles of Impeachment. A copy of the brief has been forwarded to the Government Printing Office for binding.

This letter will also confirm that copies of these documents have been served today upon counsel for Judge Nixon.

ALAN I. BARON,
Special Counsel.

[In the Senate of the United States, Sitting as a Court of Impeachment]

IN RE IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE WALTER L. NIXON, JR.

REPLICATION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO THE ANSWER OF JUDGE WALTER L. NIXON, JR., TO THE AMENDED ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT

The House of Representatives, through its Managers and counsel, replies to the Answer to the Amended Articles of Impeachment of Respondent, Judge Walter L. Nixon, Jr., as follows:

Article I

The first paragraph of Respondent's Answer to Article I simply summarizes that Article and requires no response by the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives denies each and every allegation set forth in the second, third and fourth paragraphs of Respondent's Answer to Article I.

Article II

The House of Representatives denies that Article II has been materially changed by the amendment, which simply changed the phrase "in any way influence" to "that in any way influenced," so as to conform exactly with the evidence at trial. The remainder of the first paragraph of Respondent's answer to Article II simply summarizes that Article and requires no response by the House of Representatives.

The House of Representatives denies each and every allegation set forth in the second, third and fourth paragraphs of Respondent's Answer to Article II.

The House also denies Judge Nixon's contention that the amendment changes the substance of the charge contained in Article II. In both the original version and amended Article II, the question raised is whether Judge Nixon influenced anyone in connection with the Drew Fairchild drug case. The evidence adduced at trial established that Judge Nixon did in fact influence Forrest County District Attorney Paul Holmes and Wiley Fairchild in connection with the drug case, and knew he had done so. Accordingly, Judge Nixon's grand jury testimony at issue in Article II was false or misleading as charged.

Article III

The first paragraph of Respondent's Answer to Article III simply summarizes that Article and requires no response by the House of Representatives.

With regard to all remaining paragraphs of Respondent's Answer to Article III, the House of Representatives denies each and every allegation in the answer that denies the acts, knowledge, intent or wrongful conduct charged against respondent in Article III, or that otherwise suggests that respondent's grand jury testimony and interview statements were true and correct. The House of Representatives further states that Article III properly alleges an impeachable offense, is not subject to a motion to dismiss, and should be considered and adjudicated by the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment. The House of Representatives incorporates by reference, in its Replication to Respondent's Answer to Article III, its response to the Answer of Respondent to Articles I and II.

1. Article III(1)

In addition to the foregoing, the House of Representatives responds to Repondent's Answer to the specific allegations of Article III(1)(A) through (G) as follows:

(A) The House of Representatives denies that the impeachment charge alleged in Article III(1)(A) is "virtually identical" to the Count II prejury charge on which Respondent was acquitted by the jury, and further denies that the jury verdict of acquittal on Count II of Respondent's criminal indictment in any way bars consideration by the Senate of Article III(1)(A).

(B) The House of Representatives denies that the impeachment charge alleged in Article III(1)(B) is "virtually identical" to the Count II perjury charge on which Respondent was acquitted by the jury, and further denies that the jury verdict of acquittal on Count II of Respondent's criminal indictment in any way bars consideration by the Senate of Article III(1)(B). The House of Representatives also denies that the allegations in subsections (A) and (B) of Article III(1) are "duplicitious and redundant." Subsections (A) and (B) of Article III allege two distinct false or misleading statements by Respondent, and both subsections should be considered and adjudicated by the Senate.

(C) The House of Representatives denies that Article III(1)(C) "does not accurately describe or refer" to actual statements by Respondent.

(D) The House of Representatives denies that the statement by Respondent referred to in Article III(1)(D) is "vague and imprecise," and states that the Senate can and should deem this to be a material or misleading statement.

(E) The House of Representatives denies that Article III(1)(E) "distorts" or "omits material portions" of Respondent's actual statement in a "misleading manner."

(F) The House of Representatives denies that the allegations in subsection (E) and (F) of Article III(1) are "duplicitous and redundant." Subsections (E) and (F) of Article III(1) allege two distinct false or misleading statements by Respondent, and both subsections should be considered and adjudicated by the Senate.

(G) The House of Representatives denies that Article III(1)(G) "does not accurately describe" Respondent's statement during the April 1984 interview.

2. Article III(2)

In addition to the foregoing, with regard to Respondent's Answer to the specific statements alleged in Article III(2), the House of Representatives agrees that the statement of Respondent set forth in Article I is also the basis for Article III(2)(A), and that the statements of Respondent set forth in Article II are also the basis for Article III(2)(D), (F) and (G).

The House of Representatives denies that the statement of Respondent set forth in Article II is also the basis for Article III(2)(E), inasmuch as the specific statement set forth in Article III(2)(E) was not an "underscored material declaration" in Count IV of Respondent's criminal indictment found by the jury to be false. Article III(2)(E) addresses a separate, distinct instance, not alleged in Article II, when Judge Nixon swore to the grand jury that he never talked to anyone, including the State prosecutor, about the Drew Fairchild case. However, the House of Representatives acknowledges that the statements set forth in Articles II and III(2)(E) were each part of Respondent's lengthy response during his grnad jury testimony to the question, "Judge, do you have anything you want to add?"

The House of Representatives denies that Article III(2) is "multiplicitous, redundant and fundamentally unfair." Article III properly alleges an impeachable offense, is distinct from Articles I and II, and should be considered and adjudicated by the Senate. The House of Representatives denies that any portion of Article III is defective, and will oppose any motion to dismiss all or part of Article III.

The House of Representatives denies that Article III(2)(G) has been changed in a "material" manner by the amendment, which simply changes "in any way influence" to "that in any way influenced" so as to conform exactly to the evidence at trial.

The House of Representatives denies that Article III(2)(B) "distorts and misstates" Respondent's actual grand jury testimony.

First affirmative defense

The House of Representatives denies each and every allegation of this purported defense. This defense was abandoned by Judge Nixon prior to trail, and no evidence has been presented in support of this defense. The House of Representatives further states that this purported defense is not relevant to the Impeachment Articles and is insufficient as a matter of law. This purported defense of "vindictive prosecution" is a question particularly appropriate for judicial resolution that has been finally resolved by the judicial branch against Respondent without pending appeal. Respondent should thereby be estopped from raising this issue during the impeachment proceedings. The House of Representatives further asserts that such "vindictive prosecution," even if true as alleged, cannot excuse or be a defense to the misconduct by Respondent set forth in the Articles of Impeachment.

Second affirmative defense

The House of Representatives denies each and every allegation of this purported defense. The House of Representatives assets that this purported defense is not relevant to the Impeachment Articles and is insufficient as a matter of law. This purported defense of prosecutorial misconduct is a question particularly appropriate for judicial resolution that has been finally resolved by the judicial branch against Respondent. Respondent should thereby be estopped from raising this issue during the impeachment proceedings. The House of Representatives further asserts that such prosecutorial misconduct, even if true as alleged, cannot excuse or be a defense to the misconduct by Respondent set forth in the Articles of Impeachment.

Wherefore, the House of Representatives states that each of the Articles of Impeachment presents a valid basis for removing Respondent from office. Each of the three Articles should be considered and adjudicated by the Senate.

With regard to Respondent's demand for "trial before the full United States Senate," the House of Representatives denies that Article I, Section 3 of the Constitution requires that evidence be taken by the full Senate, rather than by a Committee formed pursuant to Senate Impeachment Rule XI.

Respectfully submitted,

The U.S. House of Representatives,

(By) ALAN I. BARON,
Special Counsel.

Managers of the House of Representatives: Jack Brooks, Don Edwards, Benjamin L. Cardin, F. James Sensenbrenner, William E. Dannemeyer.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 265) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Committee on Ways and Means, Benjamin L. Cardin, Maryland.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to clause 4 of rule I, the Speaker signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution on Friday, October 13, 1989:

H.R. 2087. An act to transfer a certain program with respect to child abuse from title IV of Public Law 98-473 to the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, and for other purposes;

H.R. 2088. An act to revise and extend the programs established in the Temporary Child Care for Handicapped Children and Crisis Nurseries Act of 1986;

H.R. 2978. An act to amend section 700 of title 18, United States Code, to protect the physical integrity of the flag; and

S.J. Res. 213. A joint resolution act designating October 22 through October 29, 1989, as "National Red Ribbon Week for a Drug-Free America."

CAPITAL GAINS: BAD MEDICINE FOR A SICK MARKET

(Mr. TORRICELLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, George Bush's honeymoon is most assuredly now over. The wakeup call came from General Noriega, and the President just received his first cold shower from Wall Street.

Mr. President, it is time to get to work, time to decide why is it you sought the Presidency, to tell us where it is you would take America.

These comments and this analysis one might certainly expect from a Democratic Member, but, Mr. President, listen to this, if you will, from the president of the Chase Manhattan Bank: "There are some very significant issues out there such as the fiscal deficit, our relations with Japan, that have to be the subject of major initiatives. I'd like to see that initiative, and I haven't. There is no agenda."

Mr. President, listen to not only your critics but to your fans. It is time to lead our country.

RECOGNITION OF WORLD FOOD DAY

(Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, today October 16, more than 140 countries around the world, including the United States, are celebrating the ninth annual World Food Day as designated by the Congress and the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization [FAO].

The annual designation of World Food Day helps raise global consciousness about hunger and malnutrition at home and throughout the world. As well, it is a day to recognize the efforts of those individuals involved in food production, distribution, and other hunger relief efforts.

In the United States, 400 private voluntary organizations and more than 15,000 organizers from all 50 States are participating in educational activities, news briefings, and other events to inform the public about the food needs of millions of people throughout the world.

In Nebraska, my constitutents are participating in a national teleconference outlining the current world food situation. A public discussion at the University of Nebraska is planned to review our State's international food relief efforts in Morroco and elsewhere. And "Stop-the-Hunger" Awards will be made to several Nebraskans involved in these food relief efforts.

World Food Day 1989 has a special relevance to the United States and our northern neighbor, Canada. Both nations play critical roles in world food security. The United States alone is the world's largest food producer, exporter, and importer.

The United States and Canada provide close to two-thirds of all food aid. More than half of all the food distributed to avert starvation in Africa came from the farms of North America.

World Food Day is a time for us to recognize those providing food assistance, critical food needs that continue, and our ability to end hunger if we focus and direct our talents and resources.

MAKING COSTA RICA SAFE FOR DEMOCRACY

(Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that it is a great comfort to the overburdened American taxpayer to know that the National Endowment for Democracy has spent almost a half million of our tax dollars to promote democracy in Costa Rica.

Yes, you heard me right.

Half a million of your tax dollars, not just to promote democracy in Latin America's oldest and most stable democracy, but to join with the drug-running General Noriega to gin up opposition and personal attacks on the Nobel Prize-winning President Oscar Arias. Yes, our tax money was used to underwrite a magazine that attacked his political amateurism and asserted that his peace plan was impugning the national virility of Costa Rica.

Mr. President, embarrassing as this disclosure may be, it highlights the underlying sham of the National Endowment for Democracy.

NED is an open invitation to international scandal. We are subjecting ourselves to international ridicule, confirming the worst charges about U.S. political interference, and underwriting activities which, if conducted by a foreign nation in the United States, would be blatantly illegal.

If promoting democracy is the goal, let us spend the NED's $16 million budget right here at home in America, where our own voter registration is low, where our own election turnout is disgraceful, and where our own political campaigns could contain a lot more civic education.

If the Democratic and Republican Parties, and the AFL-CIO and Chamber of Commerce are so anxious to promote NED activities abroad, by all means they should raise money and do it. But once and for all, let us get the U.S. Government out of the business of subsidizing electoral imperialism.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. As the Chair announced on July 23, 1987, it is not in order to address the President in debate. Members must address their remarks to the Chair. Although Members may discuss past and present Presidential actions and suggest possible future Presidential actions, they may not directly address the President, as in the second person.

HUMAN RIGHTS IN CUBA

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago, two subcommittees of the House Foreign Affairs Committee held a joint hearing on the status of human rights conditions in Cuba. There was serious concern expressed at that hearing about the abuses of human rights in Cuba and particularly the recent detention of leading human rights leaders in Cuba.

Now, I have learned of the arrest of additional human rights monitors in Cuba only days after our panels' examination of the repression continuing under Castro's regime.

The arrest in the last several weeks of 4 additional Cuban human rights activists brings to 26 the total number either serving prison sentences or awaiting trial in Cuba. These detentions come after the members of the U.N. human rights commission visited Cuba but failed to render any conclusions based on their observations.

I urge my colleagues to join me in condemning this continuing outrage against human rights and civil liberties in Cuba and in calling on Cuban authorities to release those being held for their actions in support of human rights.

APPROACHING CRISIS IN THE AMERICAN ECONOMY

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today our government is on automatic pilot as across-the-board cuts are due here in Washington.

Now, let us look at the facts. Since World War II America has given $600 billion away in foreign aid with nothing to show for it except Marcos and Baby Doc.

America defends South Korea and their students yell Yankee go home. America protects Japanese oil and they ship us toasters. America spends $120 billion a year to protect NATO countries, and they meet every year to plan strategies to ship us more goods.

The truth of the matter is Congress is nothing more than a board of trustees overseeing the biggest bankruptcy in history, and no one down here other than the gentleman from Missouri [DICK GEPHARDT], and a few others can see it.

The bottom line is we have a crisis ahead that will make the 1929 crash look like a fender bender, and for all those that keep making light of it, in about 10 years try and eat your Toyota.

DOES THE UNITED STATES PRODUCE ENOUGH FOOD TO FEED THE WORLD?

(Ms. LONG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. LONG. Mr. Speaker, last week an Agriculture Subcommittee held a hearing on our U.S. grain reserve. One of the questions which arose was: "Does the United States produce enough food to feed the world?" The answer subcommittee members received was a resounding yes. However, there was significant debate about why the food the United States produces does not get to hungry people around the globe.

It is particularly appropriate that today, World Food Day, we again ask why, when enough food is produced to feed the world, people still go hungry.

More than 100 million people in Africa, almost 500 million people in Asia, and millions more in Latin America do not obtain enough food to maintain nutritionally sufficient diets. Even in our own country, in both urban and rural areas, there are millions of people who go hungry every day.

Mr. Speaker, it is critical that we ensure that the agricultural resources of our country are effectively utilized in the effort to eradicate hunger in our Nation and throughout the world.

WILL AMERICA MORTGAGE ITS FUTURE?

(Mr. DEFAZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DEFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, the Wall Street bullies are at it again. Today the Wall Street Journal has blamed legislation that would require review by the Secretary of Transportation and approval of junk bond, foreign-influence, leveraged buyouts in our major airlines as the cause of the crash of the stock market last Friday.

Why is the Wall Street Journal so exorcised with legislation that would restrict leveraged buyouts? Is it because they are afraid of someone spoiling the party? The boom of speculative profits and fat commissions that flow when these companies are put into play? The United deal alone would yield one quarter of $1 billion in commissions for this leveraged buyout.

This is a play that occurs with no eye to the future productivity or competitiveness of major sectors of U.S. industry. It is a fight to the death, or perhaps the bankruptcy, of the future commerce of this Nation.

Who will Congress and the President back? Those who want to manage American airlines and American industries into a position of world leadership in the next century, or those, like the editors of the Wall Street Journal and the junk bond kings and speculators who want to sell American industry, mortgage our future, and to hell with the future productivity and capacity of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, Randall Araskog, chairman of ITT, said:

> People wish the government would do something about leveraged buyouts, do something about takeovers, do something about Donald Trump. Where is the leadership? Where is the guy who can say: "enough is enough"?

Mr. Speaker, I hope that there are 218 Members in this House who can say enough is enough.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5 of rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken after debate has concluded on all motions to suspend the rules, but not earlier than 4:30 p.m.

AUTHORIZING DISTRIBUTION OF "A TRIBUTE TO MICKEY LELAND"

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3294) to authorize distribution within the United States of the U.S. Information Agency film entitled "A Tribute to Mickey Leland."

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 3294

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DISTRIBUTION WITHIN THE UNITED STATES OF THE UNITED STATES INFORMATION AGENCY FILM ENTITLED "A TRIBUTE TO MICKEY LELAND".

Notwithstanding section 208 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Years 1986 and 1987 (22 U.S.C. 1461-1(a)) and the second sentence of section 501 of the United States Information and Education Exchange Act of 1948 (22 U.S.C. 1461)—

(1) the Director of the United States Information Agency shall make available to the Archivist of the United States a master copy of the film entitled "A Tribute to Mickey Leland"; and

(2) upon evidence that necessary United States rights and licenses have been secured and paid for by the person seeking domestic release of the film, the Archivist shall—

(A) deposit that film in the National Archives of the United States; and

(B) make copies of that film available for purchase and public viewing within the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN].

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3294 which would authorize the release in the United States of a film made by the U.S. Information Agency.

As the Members are aware, program materials created by the USIA may not be distributed in the United States without specific legislative authority. Many times over the past years, we have provided for the U.S. distribution of films which have been of specific historical or cultural value. Mr. Speaker, this film is of special interest to us as it contains a tribute to the work and dedication of the Honorable Mickey Leland.

Although the film is less than 10 minutes long, it provides a portrait of a man dedicated to improving the lives of others both in this country and overseas. I do not believe that this film should be saved only for foreign audiences. It is of value to us and to Mr. Leland's family. I urge the passage of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my support for H.R. 3294, legislation to authorize the U.S. Information Agency to distribute overseas the film entitled "A Tribute to Mickey Leland."

Mickey was a friend and colleague of mine, and I am saddened over his tragic death in Ethiopia.

This film is important because it shows how Mickey devoted himself wholeheartedly to those who suffer in Ethiopia, the victims of communism, famine, and war. It shows how one man who is determined to make a difference can change things for the better. That is what serving in Congress is all about.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I commend the distinguished chairman of the International Organization Subcommittee, the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY] and the ranking minority member, the gentlelady from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], for bringing this bill to the floor.

I rise in support of H.R. 3294, a bill to authorize the distribution within the United States of the Information Agency film entitled "A Tribute to Mickey Leland." Our Nation has much to be proud of when we reflect about Mickey's tireless work on behalf of the world's hungry. It is important, therefore, that we disseminate information with regard to his many substantive accomplishments.

Today, as President Bush signed a proclamation declaring October 16, 1989 and 1990 as World Food Day, he noted Mickey's dedication to the hunger issue. Mickey always supported this important day by taking part in its many observances.

In addition, today the winners of the 1989 Presidential and Hunger Awards were announced. Mickey was given the lifetime achievement award. His commitment to the issue took him on his last mission to the Ethiopian refugee camps where he lost his life, seeking to help arrange for food aid already enroute to Southeast Asia to be diverted to the stricken region.

Accordingly, I support H.R. 3294 and invite our colleagues to join with us.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3294.

The question was taken; and (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

□ 1220

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 3294, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. MCDERMOTT). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

SUPPORT FOR PEOPLE OF COLOMBIA

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 194) to express the support of the Congress for the courageous people of Colombia, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. CON. RES. 194

Whereas President Virgilio Barco and the people of Colombia have shown tremendous courage and fortitude in standing up to the atrocities of the Colombian drug traffickers;

Whereas Colombian drug traffickers have assassinated a popular Presidential candidate, Senator Luis Carlos Galan; a Minister of Justice, Rodrigo Lara Bonilla; and Attorney General, Carlos Mauro Hoyos; an effective antinarcotics police chief, Colonel Jaime Ramirez Gomez; and an influential newspaper editor, Guillermo Cano Isaza;

Whereas Colombian drug traffickers have executed nearly 200 Colombian judges, 11 Supreme Court justices, and 4 Counsels of State;

Whereas Colombian drug traffickers have massacred thousands of others, including mayors, law enforcement officers, public officials, journalists, lawyers, and doctors, because of their antidrug activities, and have included in these massacres innocent family members and bystanders;

Whereas Colombian drug traffickers have been conducting a reign of terror which have effectively disrupted drug prosecutions in Colombia and prevented extraditions of drug traffickers;

Whereas the drug traffickers have financed the training and operations of paramilitary death squads that have been implicated in the assassination of hundreds of political and labor activists in Colombia;

Whereas in August 1989 following the brutal assassination of Presidential candidate Galan, President Barco utilized his state of siege powers to legislate by decree the extradition of drug kingpins and the seizure of their assets;

Whereas since then the Government of Colombia has seized millions of dollars of drug assets, arrested between 11,000 and 12,000 drug trafficking suspects, and on September 6, 1989, extradited a high level drug consiprator, Eduardo Martinez Romero, to the United States for prosecution;

Whereas the drug traffickers have responded to President Barco's bold actions by declaring an all-out war on the Government, the judiciary, and the press of Colombia, including their families;

Whereas the drug traffickers have vowed to kill 10 judges for every drug trafficker extradited and have targeted for assassination a judge in New York City;

Whereas the drug traffickers have commenced bombing public places and offices, such as the recent brutal attack on the office of the respected newspaper, El Espectador;

Whereas the drug traffickers have dramatically escalated their campaign of violence and intimidation against Colombian society;

Whereas the drug traffickers are exporting their terror by smuggling the illegal, deadly drug cocaine into the United States, Latin America, the Caribbean, and Europe; and

Whereas this cocaine traffic has resulted in an overwhelming increase of drug abuse and drug-related violence in the United States and elsewhere: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress—

(1) commends President Barco of Colombia and the Government and people of Colombia for their courage and strength in standing up to the drug traffickers;

(2) expresses to the Government and people of Colombia the support, respect, and empathy of the Congress and the people of the United States in this most difficult time; and

(3) commends the Administration's cooperation with the Government of Colombia and urges the Administration to continue to make available appropriate equipment, training, intelligence, and financial aid to help Colombia successfully overcome the heinous activities of the drug traffickers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN].

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 194, as amended, in support of the people of Colombia in their fight against narcotics trafficking in that country.

The people of Colombia have been under siege from narcotics traffickers for many, many years. The list of atrocities committed by the traffickers is long. We were all horrified when the Palace of Justice was attacked in 1985 by radical elements in Colombia allegedly under the direction of narcotics traffickers. As this resolution points out, over 200 Colombian judges, as well as countless other public officials, have been assassinated in recent years in an attempt by the Colombian cartels to neutralize the Colombian judicial system.

The brutal and audacious August assassination of Presidential frontrunner Luis Carlos Galan proved the final straw for the Colombian Government. Since this atrocity, the Colombian Government has waged an all-out assault on the trafficking organizations in Colombia. Thousands of traffickers have been arrested, millions of dollars in assets have been confiscated, and the extradition treaty with the United States has been reinstated. As of this weekend, four high level Colombian traffickers have been extradited to the United States to stand trial in U.S. courts.

The United States has responded to Colombian appeals for assistance by providing $65 million in emergency military assistance to Colombia and the President, in his narcotics control strategy, has proposed even more economic and military assistance in the coming years. It would be my hope that the House will consider the President's proposed increased funding for antinarcotics assistance for the Andean countries in the near future, either as part of an overall antinarcotics package or on its own. I would also like to point out to my colleagues the offer of support from various donors which has been organized by the United States Information Agency for El Espectador, which has been in the forefront of the fight against narcotics trafficking in Colombia.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution is an appropriate statement of the support of the Congress for the Colombian people. I would like to commend my good friend from New York, the chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, for introducing this resolution and would urge its unanimous adoption.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support this resolution, which commends the people of Colombia and President Barco for their brave struggle against the international cocaine traffickers.

The people of Colombia merit our praise. Under the leadership of President Barco they have united to confront the drug barons.

In the war on drugs, brave deeds and not mere words are needed. President Barco has accepted the challenge of saving his country from total lawlessness. Events have made his job one of the toughest in the world. But he is determined to restore the rule of law in his country.

It takes a man of strong character to do what President Barco has already done. He has imposed a state of siege and arrested thousands of drug trafficking suspects. He confiscated the assets of drug kingpins. He has already extradited a leading money launderer to the United States. With U.S. equipment and assistance, President Barco has stood up to the drug traffickers.

President Bush has also taken a tough line on drug trafficking. His antinarcotics strategy calls for a concerted attack on the drug cartels and their networks. The administration is cooperating closely with the Colombian Government in this critical battle.

The abuse of illicit narcotics is an international problem that demands international cooperation. Our Nation must help by reducing the demand for drugs. The United States and Europe must work together to control moneylaundering through the banks. Industrialized nations must ensure that processing chemicals are not shipped to drug laboratories in Colombia or elsewhere.

Colombia and the United States cannot win the drug war alone. International cooperation is essential.

I respect President Barco's courageous decision to do everything necessary to save his country from the drug barons.

With this resolution, we have an opportunity to send a clear message of support and concern to President Barco and his people. I urge my colleagues to support this timely resolution.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL], the sponsor of the resolution.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House is considering House Concurrent Resolution 194, commending the Government and people of Colombia. The Government under the leadership of President Barco and the many law-abiding citizens of Colombia have demonstrated great courage and resolve in their stance against the drug trafficking organizations.

The drug traffickers of Colombia are some of the most ruthless, vicious criminals in the world. Not only are they merchants of a dangerous, even deadly product—cocaine—but they conduct their business by threats, bribes, assassinations, bombings, kidnapings, and other terrorist type activities.

I believe the terms originated in Colombia, but we have had to coin new words to describe these criminals and their activities—narcoterrorists and narcoterrorism. Unfortunately, today, they are common words used in almost every newsstory we read about Colombia.

Mr. Speaker, it is easy for us in the U.S. Congress to talk tough on drugs, because we do not have to fear that our talk will cost us our lives or the lives of our families. Our Colombian colleagues do not have it so easy.

Many throughout the Colombian executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government, many in local governments, many in the press, and many civic leaders are outspoken opponents of drug trafficking. A number of these courageous individuals have been the target of narcoterrorist attacks, and we mourn their loss. It attests to the integrity of the Colombian people that so many bravely continue this fight, in spite of the incredible danger.

The tragic events of August were a call to arms on both sides of this war on drugs. While the most imminent threat of narcoterrorism may be directed at Colombia, the drug traffickers threaten us all. This is not Colombia's war; it is our war, collectively. We must stand in solidarity with our brothers and sisters in Colombia against this evil. We must lend them our support. And we must enlist the support of our allies in the Hemisphere and around the world in this international struggle.

I would like to insert into the RECORD a letter I recently received from President Barco concerning House Congressional Resolution 194. Allow me to share with you now some brief passages; President Barco writes:

> You and I both know that we are just beginning this international battle against organized crime, a battle that will be won if we are able to cooperate and present a united front. We must jointly attack these vicious criminals at all levels . . .
> Expressions of support, commitment and understanding, such as yours, give our people greater encouragement to continue fighting the international cocaine business and the drug mafia.

Mr. Speaker, it was out of my deep respect for the Colombian people and their immense courage that I introduced this resolution. Since then, there have been several significant events for which we should commend the Colombian Government. In spite of serious threats, the Supreme Court of Colombia upheld President Barco's decree which permits the extradition of Colombian nationals to face drug trafficking charges. Just this weekend, three additional Colombian drug suspects were extradited to the United States.

I hope that all of my colleagues will join with me today in showing that the entire United States House of Representatives supports and appreciates the efforts of Colombia against the drug traffickers.

PRESIDENCIA DE LA REPÚBLICA
Bogotá, September 19, 1989.

Hon. CHARLES B. RANGEL,
Chairman, Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, United States House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN RANGEL: On behalf of the people of Colombia and in my own, I wish to thank you for your letter of August 21st. Your expressions of sympathy for the tragic events that have occurred are deeply appreciated.

The Resolution 194 that you presented before the House of Representatives of the United States on September 11th, shows your profound understanding of Colombia's situation and your continuous support in our struggles against the drug traffickers.

You and I both know that we are just beginning this international battle against organized crime, a battle that will be won if we are able to cooperate and present a united front. We must jointly attack these vicious criminals at all levels: the producers, the distributors and the consumers of illegal drugs.

You have been a firm friend through these difficult times. Expressions of support, commitment and understanding, such as yours, give our people greater encouragement to continue fighting the international cocaine business and the drug mafia.

Sincerely,

Virigilio Barco

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor, I am pleased to rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 194 expressing the support of the Congress for the courageous people of Colombia.

The decision of the Colombian Government to vigorously pursue the leaders and members of the international narcotics trafficking cartels operating in Colombia merit the strong support and commendation of all of us who are fighting to end the deadly drug menace afflicting our citizens.

The Colombian Government's actions, supported by our own administration's efforts, deserve all the help we can offer. For too long, it appeared that the United States was carrying out a fight against drugs that was not being given sufficient attention by our allies in Latin America. In more recent years, that has changed, and especially now with Colombia's total commitment to combat the narcotraffickers, we can be hopeful that we finally have the cooperation we need to be more effective against the organized drug cartels.

House Concurrent Resolution 194 recognizes these actions, commends President Bush and commends the Government and people of Colombia for their courageous dedication in what is literally a fight for their lives, and for ours, too.

I urge my colleagues to give their unanimous support for this resolution.

□ 1230

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 194, expressing the support of the Congress for the courageous people of Colombia in their efforts to combat the drug traffickers.

As a senior member of the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Narcotics Select Committee, I want to commend the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CROCKETT] and the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], respectively chairman and ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, for bringing this resolution, which I have cosponsored, to the floor of the House for consideration. I also want to commend my good friend, CHARLES RANGEL, the author of this resolution, the chairman of the House Select Narcotics Committee and a leader in the effort to combat drugs, both at home and abroad, and the ranking member of our selected committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN].

Mr. Speaker, the drug traffickers are conducting a reign of terror in Colombia. The Colombian judicial system has become paralyzed and understandably so. The drug traffickers have murdered over 200 judges, 11 supreme court justices, a minister of justice and an attorney general, and numerous public officials, journalists, law enforcement officers, and civilians in a continuing campaign of violence. Hardly a day goes by when there is not a drug-related assassination or bombing.

However, when the cartels assassinated the popular presidential candidate, Luis Carlos Galan, they went too far. The Colombian people and the government, led by its courageous president, Virgilio Barco, were so outraged that a widespread and severe counterattack against the traffickers was implemented.

In recent months the Colombian authorities have rounded up over 12,000 drug suspects, seized millions of dollars worth of property and assets belonging to the drug traffickers and revived the extradition process.

The United States has provided Colombia with $65 million worth of emergency military assistance, as well as $2 million to help protect judges. More assistance will follow as part of the President's $2 billion, 5-year Andean military, law enforcement and economic assistance program. Hopefully Europe, Canada, and Japan will join us in the effort to help Colombia fight the drug lords.

The Colombian people and government are engaged in a heroic struggle against the drug cartels. They deserve our praise and they need our support. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this important resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS].

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, it is important, without question, that the resolution be clear in its support of the Colombian people, because they are both the allies and the victims of the terrible ravages of that war that exists in their own country.

However, there is another, grander reason we must pass this resolution and get the message out to the Colombian people as swiftly and as strongly as possible, and that is the rumor, if it is just a rumor, that the Government of Colombia or some members of that government were willing to sit down and negotiate with the drug dealer kingpins in Colombia for some kind of cease-fire for accommodation or realization of common goals or whatever these negotiations might have tried to produce, which would be a horrible thing to contemplate.

If we can demonstrate to the people of that country and the leadership, that if they stand firm and that they follow the tenets of the international community which is willing to come to their side to help them, then we can shove aside any inclination that any person in Colombia might have to enter into negotiations with the drug lords in that country.

I hope that we pass the resolution and that we have a clear bell of support resounding from this Chamber that the people of Colombia need to resort to nothing more than their own strengths, not to negotiate with the enemy.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN], the vice chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to fully endorse House Concurrent Resolution 194, which commends the Colombian Government and people for their courage in fighting the ruthless drug trafficking organizations. I would like to commend Mr. RANGEL, the author of this resolution and the Chairman of the House Select Narcotics Committee, for his continuing efforts to combat the blight of drugs at home and abroad.

The Colombians are hitting back hard at the drug kingpins. President Barco, ruling by executive decree, has pledged to do to the traffickers the one thing they fear most, to extradite them to the United States to face justice.

A handful of men run the trafficking organizations. If these cartel leaders are arrested and extradited to the United States, and if their financial assets are seized and forfeited, their operations, at least for a time, will become paralyzed. Already, four Colombians have been extradited to the United States on drug trafficking and money laundering charges.

The Colombians, in their national crackdown on the drug cartels, have seized some key trafficker assets, including their private fleet of jet planes, and have continued to destroy clandestine labs used to process cocaine.

The $65 million emergency military assistance package, offered by the White House last month, will help them to step up these efforts. Additional United States assistance for Colombia will follow shortly as a key part of the new anti-drug strategy unveiled by President Bush on September 5. The President's Andean initiative calls for substantial military and economic assistance for Colombia, as well as for Peru and Bolivia, over the next several years.

The Colombian people and the Colombian Government deserve our moral and material support, as well as our praise and respect, for their heroic struggle against cocaine trafficking. Their fight against the traffickers is also our fight. Their enemy is our enemy.

I strongly support this resolution (House Concurrent Resolution 194) and urge my colleagues to join me in sending this message of commendation to the brave people of Colombia.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN] that the House suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 194), as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 5, rule I, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and include therein extraneous material on the concurrent resolution just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

DESIGNATING CERTAIN LANDS IN LOS PADRES NATIONAL FOREST AS WILDERNESS AND SESPE CREEK AND THE SISQUOC RIVER AS WILD AND SCENIC RIVERS

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 1473) to designate certain lands in Los Padres National Forest as wilderness, to designate Sespe Creek and the Sisquoc River in the State of California as wild and scenic rivers, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 1473

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. FINDINGS AND POLICY.

The Congress finds that—

(1) areas of undeveloped National Forest System land on Los Padres National Forest have outstanding natural characteristics giving them high value as wilderness and will, if properly preserved, contribute as an enduring resource of wilderness for the benefit of the American people;

(2) it is in the national interest that certain of these areas be promptly designated as components of the National Wilderness Preservation System in order to preserve such areas as an enduring resource of wilderness which shall be managed to promote and perpetuate the wilderness character of the land and its specific multiple values for watershed preservation, wildlife habitat protection, scenic and historic preservation, scientific research and educational use, primitive recreation, solitude, physical and mental challenge, and inspiration for the benefit of all of the American people of present and future generations; and

(3) geologic evidence and production data suggest that a producing oil and gas field adjacent to the proposed Sespe Wilderness extends into such area.

SEC. 2. DESIGNATION OF WILDERNESS AREAS.

In furtherance of the purposes of the Wilderness Act, the following National Forest System lands are hereby designated as wilderness and, therefore, as components of the National Wilderness Preservation System—

(1) certain lands in Los Padres National Forest and the Angeles National Forest, California, which comprise approximately 211,000 acres, which are generally depicted on a map entitled "Sespe Wilderness Area—Proposed" and dated September 1989, and shall be known as the Sespe Wilderness;

(2) certain lands in Los Padres National Forest, California, which comprise approximately 30,000 acres, which are generally depicted on a map entitled "Matilija Wilderness Area—Proposed" and dated May 1988, and shall be known as the Matilija Wilderness;

(3) certain lands in Los Padres National Forest, California, which comprise approximately 51,000 acres, which are generally depicted on a map entitled "San Rafael Wilderness Addition—Proposed" and dated September 1989, and which lands are hereby incorporated in, and shall be deemed to be a part of, the San Rafael Wilderness;

(4) certain lands in Los Padres National Forest, California, which comprise approximately 11,600 acres, which are generally depicted on a map entitled "Garcia Wilderness Area—Proposed" and dated September 1989, and shall be known as the Garcia Wilderness;

(5) certain lands in Los Padres National Forest, California, which comprise approximately 36,000 acres, which are generally depicted on a map entitled "San Emigdio Wilderness—Proposed" and dated September 1989, and shall be known as the San Emigdio Mesa Wilderness; and

(6) certain lands in Los Padres National Forest, California, which comprise approximately 38,000 acres, which are generally depicted on a map entitled "Ventana Wilderness Addition—Proposed" and dated September 1989, and which lands are hereby incorporated in, and shall be deemed to be a part of, the Ventana Wilderness.

SEC. 3. ADMINISTRATION OF WILDERNESS AREAS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subject to valid existing rights, each wilderness area designated by this Act shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with the provisions of the Wilderness Act. Any reference in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the effective date of this Act.

(b) FIRE PREVENTION AND WATERSHED PROTECTION.—Notwithstanding any provision of the Wilderness Act, in order to provide for the continued viability of the watershed affected by these wilderness designations, and to provide for the continued health and safety of the communities serviced by such watersheds, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to take whatever actions in the Sespe, Matilija, Garcia, San Emigdio Mesa, Ventana, and San Rafael Wilderness areas which are deemed necessary for fire prevention and watershed protection including, but not limited to, fire presuppression and fire suppression measures and techniques utilized elsewhere on the National Forest System.

(c) SESPE CONDOR SANCTUARY.—Notwithstanding any provision of the Wilderness Act (16 U.S.C. 1131 et seq.), the Secretary of Agriculture may take such measures and utilize such facilities as are necessary for the management of the Sespe Condor Sanctuary, including (but not limited to) road, vehicular, and helicopter access, and related facilities. Such measures are to be taken only for the preservation and protection of the California Condor and related habitat as part of the recovery program for the Condor.

(d) SPECIAL MANAGEMENT RESTRICTION.—Notwithstanding any provision of the Wilderness Act (16 U.S.C. 1131 et seq.) and section 5112 of the Federal Onshore Oil and Gas Leasing Reform Act of 1987 (30 U.S.C. 226-3), the Secretary of the Interior may, under existing authority, issue oil and gas leases for the subsurface of the Sespe Wilderness. Such leases shall not allow surface occupancy and may be entered only by directional drilling from outside the Sespe Wilderness.

(e) ADJACENT MANAGEMENT.—The Congress does not intend that wilderness areas designated under this Act lead to the creation of protective perimeters or buffer zones around such wilderness areas. The fact that nonwilderness activities or uses can be seen or heard from areas within the wilderness shall not, of itself, preclude such activities or uses up to the boundary of the wilderness area.

SEC. 4. FILING OF MAPS AND DESCRIPTIONS.

As soon as practicable after enactment of this Act, a map and a legal description of each wilderness area designated in section 2 shall be filed with the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, and each such map and description shall have the same force and effect as if included in this Act. Correction of clerical and typographical errors in each such legal description and map may be made. Each such map and legal description shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Chief of the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture, Washington, District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. RELEASE TO NONWILDERNESS USES.

The table contained in section 111(e) of the California Wilderness Act of 1984 (98 Stat. 1631) is amended by striking all lines pertaining to further planning areas on the Los Padres National Forest. These areas shall be released to nonwilderness uses in accordance with Section 111 (except for subsections (e)) of such Act.

SEC. 6. DESIGNATION OF WILD AND SCENIC RIVERS.

In order to preserve and protect for present and future generations the outstandingly remarkable values of Sespe Creek, the Big Sur River, and the Sisquoc River, all in California, section 3(a) of the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act (16 U.S.C. 1274(a)) is amended by adding the following new paragraphs at the end:

"( ) SESPE CREEK, CALIFORNIA.—The 4 mile segment of the main stem of the creek from its confluence with Rock Creed and Howard Creek downstream to its confluence with Trout Creek, to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture as a scenic river; and the 27.5-mile segment of the main stem of the creek extending from its confluence with Trout Creek downstream to where it leaves section 26, township 5 north, range 20 west, to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture as a wild river.

"( ) SISQUOC RIVER, CALIFORNIA.—The 31-mile segment of the main stem of the river extending from its origin downstream to its confluence with Burro Creek, to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture as a wild river.

"( ) BIG SUR RIVER, CALIFORNIA.—The main stems of the South Fork and North Fork of the Big Sur River from their headwaters to their confluence and the main stem of the river from the confluence of the South and North Forks downstream to the boundary of the Ventana wilderness in Los Padres National Forest, to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture as a wild river.".

SEC. 7. STUDY RIVERS.

(a) STUDY.—Section 5(a) of the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act (16 U.S.C. 1271-1287) is amended by adding the following new paragraphs at the end thereof:

"( ) PIRU CREEK, CALIFORNIA.—The segment of the main stem of the creek from its source downstream to the maximum pool of Pyramid Lake and the segment of the main stem of the creek beginning 300 feet below the dam at Pyramid Lake downstream to the maximum pool at Lake Piru.

"( ) LITTLE SUR RIVER, CALIFORNIA.—The segment of the main stem of the river from its headquarters downstream to the Pacific Ocean. The Secretary of Agriculture shall consult with the Big Sur Multiagency Advisory Council during the study of the river.

"( ) UPPER SESPE CREEK, CALIFORNIA.—The main stem from its confluence with Chorro Grande Canyon downstream to its confluence with Rock Creek and Howard Creek.".

SEC. 8. VENTANA LAND EXCHANGE.

(a) MAP.—The map entitled "New Los Padres Dam Project—Forest and Wilderness Boundary Adjustment—Los Padres National Forest" dated September, 1989 (hereafter in this section referred to as the "map") shall describe the lands for which exchanges and other actions are authorized by this section. The map shall be on file and available for public inspection in the office of the Chief, Forest Service, Washington, District of Columbia.

(b) BOUNDARIES.—Upon completion of the exchange, the boundaries of the Ventana Wilderness and Los Padres National Forest are hereby modified as necessary to accommodate the land exchange authorized by this section.

(c) GENERAL AUTHORITY.—Subject to valid existing rights, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to offer for exchange to the California-American Water Company the lands comprising Parcel A and to receive, in exchange for Parcel A, all right, title and interest in Parcel B, as generally depicted on the map. The title to Parcel B shall be in California-American Water Company and the title conveyed in the exchange shall be by general warranty deed and shall be otherwise acceptable to the Secretary. Such exchange is deemed to be an equal value exchange. Nothing in this section shall preclude the Secretary from exhanging Parcel A to the California-American Water Company in exchange for other lands utilizing existing exchange authorities in the event that the California-American Water Company does not acquire title to Parcel B.

(d) MANAGEMENT.—Upon acquisition by the United States, Parcel B shall be thereafter managed as National Forest Wilderness and shall be withdrawn from all forms of location and entry under the mining and mineral leasing laws and from the geothermal leasing laws.

SEC. 9. OFF-ROAD VEHICLE TRAIL.

The Secretary of agriculture shall construct in the area adjacent to the San Emigdio Mesa Wilderness a trail for off-road vehicles that connects the Long Canyon trail with the Sulphur Springs trail.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. VENTO].

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and include therein extraneous material on H.R. 1473, as amended, the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1473 sponsored by my colleague from California, Mr. LAGOMARSINO, would designate wilderness and wild and scenic rivers in the Los Padres National Forest in California. Throughout the committee markup process, I have worked closely with Mr. LAGOMARSINO, Mr. LEVINE, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. PANETTA to resolve any concerns they have with the bill. These negotiations have been reasonably successful and we have a bill that, while not completely agreeable to all, is generally acceptable and I believe an equitable compromise. The bill as amended now has bipartisan support and I thank my colleagues from California for their cooperation.

H.R. 1473 would accomplish the following:

First, it designates approximately 378,000 acres of wilderness. This is approximately 135,000 more wilderness acres than the bill as introduced. It designates four new wilderness areas—Sespe, the Matilija, the Garcia, and the San Emigdio Mesa and it adds lands to the existing San Rafael, called La Brea, and Ventana Wilderness Areas.

Second, it eliminates the provision in the original bill which would have allowed off-road vehicle use on the Johnston Ridge trail in the Sespe Wilderness.

Third, it designates three wild and scenic rivers: Sespe Creek, the Sisquoc River, and the Big Sur River. It adds 4 additional miles to the upper Sespe which were not in the original bill.

Fourth, it designates three rivers to be studied for wild and scenic river designation—Piru Creek, the Little Sur River, and upper Sespe Creek. These are additions to the original bill. Study designation for the upper Sespe is a fair compromise between those who want to protect Sespe Creek and those who would like to develop its water resources. Study status would protect segment II of the upper Sespe for 6 years and give Congress a chance to revisit the issue.

Fifth, it directs the Secretary of Agriculture to construct a loop trail outside of the wilderness for off-road vehicle users.

Sixth, it also directs the Secretary to accomplish a land exchange with the California-American Water Co.

This bill adds significantly and substantial additions to the Wilderness System in the Los Padres National Forest. Over 50 percent of the acreage that the Forest Service studied as further planning areas would become wilderness. The Los Padres National Forest would end up with a total of 791,000 acres of wilderness in 9 areas, which is 45 percent of the national forest's total acreage. This is a much higher percentage of wilderness than the average for national forests which is less than 20 percent. I urge my colleagues to support the passage of this worthy piece of legislation.

□ 1240

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 1473, the legislation I introduced designating certain areas in the Los Padres National Forest in California as wilderness and adding portions of the Sespe, Sisquoc, and Big Sur Rivers—also located in the forest—to the National Wild and Scenic Rivers system. Since introducing this bill, the Interior Committee has amended it, further expanding both the wilderness and wild and scenic river designations making this a forestwide bill.

As my colleagues may recall, I introduced, along with Senator PETE WILSON, legislation similar to the original version of H.R. 1473 last Congress. Unfortunately, we adjourned before being able to consider it. Senator WILSON will be introducing a new companion measure to H.R. 1473 in the other body.

I am very encouraged that our colleague, BRUCE VENTO, the chairman of the Interior Subcommittee on National Parks and Public Lands considered my bill in a very timely and positive manner. He and his able staff, particularly Dale Crane, Jim Bradley, and Heather Huyck were instrumental in bringing this legislation, important to both me and my district, to the House floor. I very much appreciate the friendly cooperation of Chairman VENTO and look forward, in my capacity as ranking Republican for parks on the subcommittee, to continue working in this same spirit on other conservation and land management measures.

I also want to thank Interior Committee Chairman MO UDALL for his support and for bringing this measure before the full Interior Committee in a very timely manner. Like Chairman VENTO's, his support was essential and very much appreciated. The support and cooperation of my colleagues LEON PANETTA and BILL THOMAS of California was also very critical and much appreciated.

H.R. 1473 as originally written would designate two wild and scenic rivers—portions of Sisquoc River and Sespe Creek—create two new wilderness areas and expand an existing wilderness within the Los Padres National Forest. It would implement key recommendations of the U.S. Forest Service following completion of the final management plan for the forest.

I should point out that the Forest Service did an extensive review with much public input. The Forest Service's final plan was based on over 1,800 written comments, 91 percent of which were individual responses, not petitions or form letters; over 10,000 other comments; and 11 public meetings and hearings from Salinas in the north to Pasadena in the south. There is real breadth and quality in this input. I strongly believe this reflects the hard work of Los Padres Forest Supervisor Art Carroll and his staff, particularly forest planner Gerry Little. My colleagues should be aware that Art and Gerry came to Washington just before the subcommittee markup and provided critical insight and assistance in crafting the final version of this bill.

H.R. 1473 as originally introduced is based on this responsible Forest Service recommendation completed last year under the competent leadership of supervisor Art Carroll. It is, I strongly believe, a balanced, reasonable bill designed to satisfactorily address the core concerns of all the diverse interests involved—from water development to environmental preservation. The broad base of support it has—from local farmers and economic development interests to noted environmentalists and the whole spectrum of recreational interests is testimony to its careful drafting. In its original form, H.R. 1473 addressed only the river and wilderness portions in the 21st and 19th Congressional Districts which ELTON GALLEGLY—an original cosponsor—and I represent, respectively.

Since his visit to the Sespe region in Ventura County over Memorial Day weekend and the subsequent informational hearing this past July, I have worked very closely with Parks Subcommittee Chairman VENTO in an effort to address the additional concerns of the environmental community. We expanded my bill to include over 135,000 additional acres of new wilderness, to increase the Sespe Wild and Scenic River designation, to add portions of the Big Sur River as wild and scenic, and to designate studies of the Little Sur River, Piru Creek, and the remainder of segment II of Sespe Creek. H.R. 1473, through Chairman VENTO's amendment in the nature of a substitute, is now a forestwide bill incorporating provisions affecting the districts of Representatives LEON PANETTA and BILL THOMAS. Clearly, it is significantly larger than the Forest Service's final plan. With the adoption of this bill, approximately 45 percent of the Federal lands within the forest would be designated wilderness.

While I worked very closely with Chairman VENTO in crafting the additions in my district and, in general, support these provisions, I am not totally satisfied with the end product. I am concerned that in an effort to address the further concerns of some in the environmental community, we did not give the proper attention and weight to the concerns of other forest users—like those in the off-road vehicle recreation community. They, too, enjoy use of the forest and I am disturbed that some new wilderness additions were made at the expense of this community.

In particular, I am opposed to the deletion by the Interior Committee of my special Johnston Ridge Trail language that keeps this important trail and access route to the Sespe Hot Springs open. In the subcommittee, I offered an amendment to reincorporate the special Johnston Ridge Trail provisions during full committee consideration. Unfortunately, while the vote was close, I did not prevail. While I believe this bill would be superior with the Johnston Ridge Trail kept open, the omission of this special provision does not warrant delaying consideration of this important bill.

Furthermore, I am concerned about some of the boundaries of the new proposed San Emigdio Mesa Wilderness Area. This area was incorporated into the bill with very little public input. In fact, much of the public didn't even know it was being considered. I hope these speedy decisions, made without proper survey of this territory by the Forest Service and others, do not bear too many burdens. In response to these concerns, I am encouraged that the Interior Committee has agreed that some modifications can be made during the Senate's consideration of this issue.

For example, I have recently learned that important platinum and chromium mining interests are located in the southernmost parts of the San Emigdio Mesa Wilderness. In light of Congress' actions 3 years ago with the 1986 Anti-Apartheid Act in which we stated our objective to reduce dependence on South Africa for strategic minerals such as these, I believe it is very prudent and very much in our national security interests to exclude these small bits of acreage from the wilderness. I am not opposed to expanding the wilderness in other areas to compensate for these minor modifications provided that we do not jeopardize ORV trails or the proposed State ORV trail system. Already these interests have made their fair share of compromises.

I am also recommending that the Senate carefully consider the wilderness boundary near the special geological site in the proposed San Emigio Mesa Wilderness area. While I fully agree that the geological site should be included in wilderness, I disagree about including the access road to this site. This road is open to the public today and is the only means for children, the elderly, and handicapped—those unable to hike long distances—to enjoy the wonders of this special area. I am hopeful that all will agree that minor modifications like these enhance, not degrade, the quality of this legislation.

Since I introduced this bill, debate has arisen about the proposed wild and scenic designation for the Sespe River. My bill originally proposed that 27.5 miles of the Sespe be designated as "wild and scenic." Upon further review with Subcommittee Chairman VENTO, I agreed to add a further 4 miles of the creek, from the confluence of Rock and Howard Creeks to Trout Creek, to the designation as "scenic." In proposing portions of Sespe Creek for wild and scenic designation, great care was taken to leave two sites, Cold Springs and Oat Mountain, open for possible future development.

Southern California is facing serious water shortages which will only become more severe in the years to come. As the local water conservation district testified, usage continues to outstrip supply. Even after the strictest of conservation and recycling measures and the utilization of State water resources, Ventura County is predicted to be short of water in the future. Already, overpumping of the aquifer underneath the Oxnard Plain has led to salt water intrusion from the ocean. Salt water intrusion has recently been found in the deeper Fox Canyon aquifer. This jeopardizes the future of the fertile, extremely productive farmland on the plain. Continued salt water intrusion will economically, agriculturally, and environmentally ruin this rich area. Sespe water is a critical factor in reversing the salt water and recharging the Oxnard aquifer. It is also tied into the Freeman Diversion Dam on the Santa Clara River, a conservation project popular with the environmental community, that uses Sespe runoff to recharge the Oxnard Plain aquifer. My colleagues may recall that Congress has already appropriated $11 million in loans to build the Freeman diversion project.

While H.R. 1473 precludes water development at the site that water interests have determined to be the best for a dam, the Topatopa site in the heart of the wild and scenic river and wilderness area, it does leave two other possible dam sites—Cold Springs and Oat Mountain—outside of the designation as alternatives. My bill is silent on dams. It does not authorize any water projects, it only leaves the option for the future open. While there are currently neither plans nor proposals for any dams, the serious water concerns of the future dictate that we not rule out such possibilities today.

Leaving the Cold Springs and Oat Mountain sites open is critical for local support for this measure. Some key local economic development groups, like chambers of commerce and the farm bureau, initially opposed H.R. 1473 believing it went "too far." However, they now support the current Sespe provisions as a reasonable, responsible compromise and testified before the National Parks and Public Lands Subcommittee to that effect. The city council of Ventura has endorsed the Sespe provisions in the bill.

The bottom line is that a careful compromise on the Sespe Creek has been crafted. I am very encouraged that the full Interior Committee agrees. For the RECORD, I am submitting an editorial that appeared in the Ventura County Star-Free Press, a leading paper in my district, following the Interior Committee's markup of H.R. 1473. I believe this editorial is right on the mark and, as the commentary warns, we should be very careful not to miss "the forest for the creek."

All in all, I believe we have a good bill that does address the core concerns of all the diverse interests involved. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting my bill.

CITY OF SAN BUENAVENTURA,
Ventura, CA, July 18, 1989.

Congressman ROBERT LAGOMARSINO,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.
Re: H.R. 1473.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LAGOMARSINO: Last night, July 17, the City Council of the City of San Buenaventura took formal action to support H.R. 1473. This action was taken to support both the wild and scenic designation for the Sespe and to preserve options for future water supplies.

You are to be complimented for the work you have put into reaching this compromise proposal. As in the past, we thank you for your work on issues and projects that are of importance to us.

Sincerely,

JAMES L. MONAHAN,
Mayor.

[From the Ventura County Star-Free Press, Oct. 5, 1989]

THE FOREST AND THE CREEK

The eternal protection of most of Ventura County's pristine and rugged backcountry came a large step closer Wednesday, but it won't be realized until California's two senators can agree over how much of the backcountry's life-blood, Sespe Creek, is to be preserved as a wild and scenic river.

The encouraging news from Washington came from the House Interior Committee, where members unanimously approved a bill by Rep. Bob Lagomarsino of Ventura that would designate as wilderness 378,000 acres of the Los Padres National Forest. Included in the measure is the 211,000-acre Sespe Wilderness and the designation of parts of three rivers—the Big Sur in Monterey County, the Sisquoc in Santa Barbara County and Sespe Creek in Ventura County—for inclusion in the national wild and scenic rivers system.

Rep. Lagomarsino grudgingly accepted a compromise on the most contentious aspect of the bill—the exclusion of parts of the Sespe Creek that would keep open the prospect of building dams at two sites. An amendment offered by Rep. Mel Levine, D-Los Angeles, was added that would require the Forest Service to further study whether to include a 10-mile stretch that includes one of the potential dam sites, Cold Spring, in the Rose Valley area north of Ojai.

Rep. Lagomarsino and his Ventura County colleague on the committee, Rep. Elton Gallegly, resisted the amendment, but ultimately accepted it as a necessary compromise. It is mostly symbolic, as no dam was going to be built there, or even likely proposed, during the six-year study period. Also, the Forest Service will most likely be conducting the additional studies in any event, as the result of an appeal by environmentalists of the Los Padres management plan.

Rep. Lagomarsino was optimistic following the committee vote that his bill will be approved on the House floor, with little or no debate, in a matter of weeks.

If that happens, the fate of the forest will be left to the Senate, where protocol for this sort of legislation requires that the two senators from the affected state agree to the particulars. At this point, they do not.

Republican Sen. Pete Wilson has introduced a bill identical to Rep. Lagomarsino's—one that follows the Forest Service's recommendations for wilderness and wild river designations. Those recommendations include the Sespe Creek compromise that excludes the two potential dam sites.

Democratic Sen. Alan Cranston three weeks ago introduced a bill that goes well beyond those recommendations. Sen. Cranston's bill would designate as wild—and thus bar any dam construction—the entire 55-mile stretch of Sespe Creek. It also adds nearly 70,000 acres to the proposed Sespe Wilderness Area and would include the undammed sections of Piru Creek in the wild and scenic rivers sytem.

Sen. Cranston's bill undoubtedly pleases the committed environmentalists who have resisted any compromise. But it also threatens to delay passage of the wilderness legislation and rejects as meaningless the years of careful study that went into the adoption of the Forest Service recommendations.

As a matter of policy, we continue to believe that the long-term interests of Ventura County are best served by maintaining the option of a Sespe Creek dam, however remote the possibility may be. But even those who disagree with that view ought to consider what their stridence is jeopardizing.

By nearly anyone's definition, the Lagomarsino-Wilson bills are a triumph of conservationism. They would protect more than 900 square miles of the Ventura County backcountry from motorized vehicles, mining, oil development and other intrusions from man. They would declare a dam off-limits along the Sespe at the Topa Topa site—the one site with enough water storage potential to attract the interest of outside water developers.

That is a lot to gain, and thus a lot to put at risk over a few miles of Sespe Creek—especially when no proposal for a dam now exists, and the possibility of such a proposal emerging any time soon is so remote.

Sen. Cranston and his supporters are in danger of being blinded by zealousness. At this point, it would seem, they can't see the forest for the creek.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], and obviously his cooperation in this has been outstanding. We are able to work and move forward with this bill today because of that, and there are other Members of the delegation that have made contributions to this, as I mentioned earlier, one of them being certainly the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 1473, a bill to designate additional wilderness and wild and scenic rivers in the Los Padres National Forest. I urge the House to vote in support of this important legislation.

H.R. 1473, which was introduced by my colleague, the Honorable ROBERT LAGOMARSINO, would designate certain lands in the Los Padres National Forest as wilderness and would designate Sespe Creek, Big Sur River, and the Sisquoc River as wild and scenic rivers.

Mr. Speaker, the Los Padres National Forest is an important resource in central California, providing a source of recreation and enjoyment for many residents of the region. In addition, the forest serves as a critical watershed area for this highly productive agricultural region of the State.

H.R. 1473, as amended in the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, includes a number of provisions affecting the 16th District of California—provisions which I helped develop and am pleased to see in this final package.

Specifically, these provisions would add nearly 38,000 acres to the existing Ventana Wilderness in the Los Padres National Forest. The areas in this addition include Bear Mountain, Black Butte, and Junipero Serra Peak. Each of these areas provides an important addition to the existing wilderness and warrant the permanent protection afforded by this bill.

In addition, H.R. 1473 would designate the Big Sur River as a wild and scenic river from its headwaters to the point at which it emerges from the Ventana Wilderness. This designation is largely consistent with the recommendation of the Forest Service in accordance with its recently completed land management plan for the Los Padres Forest, and is supported by local conservation interest as well.

H.R. 1473, as amended, would also direct the Secretary of Agriculture to continue its study of the Little Sur River, from its headwaters to the Pacific Ocean, for possible inclusion in the wild and scenic rivers system. The legislation specifically directs the Secretary to consult with the Big Sur Multiagency Advisory Council during this study to ensure that local interests and concerns are recognized and reflected in the Forest Service's final recommendations. The Big Sur Multiagency Advisory Council has served an extremely valuable role in providing for the protection and thoughtful development of the Big Sur area. I look forward to the Council's valuable input into the Little Sur study.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1473 as amended, provides for an exchange of lands in the northernmost part of the forest, to permit the possible expansion of the Los Padres Reservoir on the Carmel River, should this alternative be selected by the Monterey Peninsula Water Management District and approved by the public. The Forest Service will receive 100 acres of land in exchange for 50 acres of private land. The lands acquired in the exchange will be added to the Ventana Wilderness in accordance with the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague, Mr. LAGOMARSINO, for his initiative in introducing this bill. I also want to express my gratitude to the chairman of the Public Lands Subcommittee, Mr. VENTO, and the chairman of the Interior Committee, Mr. UDALL, for their assistance in incorporating into H.R. 1473, the provisions of the bill which I have discussed.

I believe that these provisions make H.R. 1473 a better bill, and help to provide a more comprehensive approach to protecting the unique natural resources of the Los Padres National Forest.

I urge my colleagues in the House to vote in favor of H.R. 1473.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I just want to rise again to reiterate my appreciation for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VOLKMER], the subcommittee chairman on the Agriculture Committee, for his cooperation in providing for this bill to move forward and for the work of the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] on the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I want to join the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] in thanking the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VOLKMER] as well and I also neglected earlier to commend Rick Healy of the committee staff, too. He was actually the one who came out there and trudged around through the river and its wilderness area, as well as Lori Stillman and Matt Reynolds on my staff.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 1473, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLARA BARTON PARKWAY

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 1310) to redesignate a certain portion of the George Washington Memorial Parkway as the "Clara Barton Parkway".

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 1310

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. REDESIGNATION OF PARKWAY.

The portion of the George Washington Memorial Parkway extending from the intersection of such Parkway and MacArthur Boulevard in Montgomery County, Maryland, to the intersection of such Parkway and Canal Road in the District of Columbia is hereby redesignated as the "Clara Barton Parkway".

SEC. 2. REFERENCES.

Any reference in a law, rule, map, document, record, or other paper of the United States to the George Washington Memorial Parkway that includes the portion of such Parkway redesignated as the "Clara Barton Parkway" shall be deemed to include a reference to the "Clara Barton Parkway".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO].

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on this legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today we have an opportunity both to honor an American woman whose accomplishment in founding the American Red Cross helps us every day and to assist tourists and commuters in the Washington area by renaming part of the George Washington Memorial Parkway the Clara Barton Parkway. H.R. 1310, a bill introduced by Representative CONNIE MORELLA, designates the Maryland section of the George Washington Memorial Parkway—from the District line to the parkway's end—as the Clara Barton Parkway.

The parkway goes right by her Glen Echo, MD, home, now a national historic site. You can clearly see her house, which also served as headquarters for the American Red Cross, from the parkway. There is a close connection between the woman and the parkway. Today the organization she founded—the American Red Cross—saves lives through its first aid training and blood donation programs, assists after disasters such as Hurricane Hugo and forms a key part of our Nation's social fabric.

Various people—including other Members of Congress—testified about getting lost as a result of having one road—the George Washington Memorial Parkway—go through two different States with two different destinations. Renaming this parkway the Clara Barton Parkway will help decrease such confusion. It will also recognize a worthy figure in American history.

Mr. Speaker, I endorse H.R. 1310 and recommend its passage.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 1310 to redesignate a certain portion of the George Washington Memorial Parkway as the Clara Barton Parkway.

The legislation provides that the 8-mile segment of the parkway in Maryland would be named the Clara Barton Parkway. The redesignation is intended to eliminate the confusion which currently exists due to the same name designation for the parkway in both the States of Maryland and Virginia. In addition, the name change would honor Clara Barton, whose home—which has been designated the Clara Barton National Historic Site—is located close to the parkway in Glen Echo, MD.

Clara Barton was a noted humanitarian and founder of the American Red Cross. She served as its president from its founding in 1881 to her resignation in 1905. She is also known for her role in promoting women's rights and was the first American woman to hold a diplomatic passport. In addition, she was very active in founding free schools in the east, particularly for factory workers. Naming a portion of the George Washington Memorial Parkway after Clara Barton is certainly an appropriate tribute to this remarkable woman.

H.R. 1310 is sponsored by my good friend and colleague, Representative MORELLA, who I would like to commend for her work on this legislation. She has invested a great deal of time and effort on this issue over the past few years and has done an outstanding job in moving this legislation forward.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1310 is a good bill which deserves enactment. I know of no opposition to this legislation which would result in very minimal cost to the Federal Government. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to approve H.R. 1310.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

□ 1300

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. MORELLA].

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 1310 is a bill which will rename the section of the George Washington Parkway on the Maryland side of the Potomac River, the Clara Barton Parkway. Cosponsoring this legislation are my colleagues whose districts touch upon either end of this approximately 6 mile stretch, Congresswoman BEVERLY BYRON on the northern end and Delegate WALTER FAUNTROY on the southern end.

The purpose of this name change is to avoid the confusion of having two parkways running on either side of the river, bearing the same name. During my testimony before the Subcommittee on National Parks and Public Lands, I read an extremely amusing but at the same time pitiful letter that was sent to Ron Shaffer, better known as "Mr. Gridlock," and published in his weekly column in the Washington Post. Every wrong turn and request for directions was chronicled by the unfortunate writer who had spent 90 minutes of "dazed" driving going first in one direction and then another on the George Washington Parkway on both sides of the Potomac River. The hapless traveler ended up in uncontrollable tears at the CIA headquarters.

I am sure that most of you here in the House are familiar with this part of the roadway, but for those of you who are new to Washington or may live in another part of the District of Columbia or Virginia, the section to be renamed runs from its intersection with MacArthur Boulevard at the David W. Taylor Naval Ship Research and Development Center, and the beginning of Canal Road—which is not a part of the George Washington Parkway—at the Chain Bridge. The confusion over the naming of the roadway has long been chronicled in the paper and in the travel lore of the city. In addition, emergency vehicles serving this area can be confused as to where to go and often must spend extra time to get the exact location.

Early champions of this change include Maryland State delegate, Jean Roesser, Naomi Ulmer; and Jean Cryor, editor of the Bethesda and Potomac Gazette. Every State senator and delegate in the Montgomery County, MD, the Montgomery County Council, and Maryland Governor William Donald Schaefer, have joined in the movement to rename the parkway for Clara Barton. They were represented at the hearing by State Senator Howard Denis who represents the area.

In the hearing on the bill before the subcommittee, American Red Cross President Emeritus, George M. Elsey, testified why Clara Barton's life should be commemorated here in Washington. Mr. Elsey pointed out that Clara Barton is one of both America's and the world's genuine heroes—that her work has been continued for over 100 years by Red Cross volunteers, which today number over 1.1 million, and that her house, a National Park Service Historic Site, overlooks the parkway in Glen Echo and served as the first headquarters of the American Red Cross.

Clara Barton led a multifaceted life and has been known through history for a variety of diverse achievements. She supported the first schools for factory workers in Worcester County, MA, and the first free schools in the State of New Jersey. Remarkably, Clara Barton became the only female worker employed by the Government when she moved to Washington in 1854 and went to work for the Patent Office, and, as one of the earliest female Government workers, was surely a role model for future women in Government.

But she is best known for her contribution toward establishing the concept of first aid, which we now take for granted but which she introduced in 1904, and for expanding disaster relief from just wartime to all natural disasters. This latter accomplishment was achieved in connection with her successful campaign over a 12-year period, to have the United States sign the Treaty of Geneva in 1882, beginning a commitment to humanitarian aid that has been a proud tradition ever since in America.

Elizabeth B. Pryor, a historian and biographer of Clara Barton, has identified Clara Barton as the most decorated woman in American history. This area of the George Washington Memorial Parkway, so closely identified with the Clara Barton House and the life of this remarkable woman, is a fitting tribute to one of America's greatest heroes, male or female. Not incidentally, we will forever end the confusion caused by two parkways with the same name. I ask for your support for H.R. 1310, which will designate the Maryland side as the Clara Barton Parkway.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, it is with enthusiasm as an original cosponsor of H.R. 1310 that I speak in support of the passage of this legislation to redesignate a portion of the George Washington Memorial Parkway in the District of Columbia and in Montgomery County, MD, as the Clara Barton Parkway.

The renaming of this highway segment on this side of the Potomac in honor of Clara Barton is most appropriate for a number of reasons. Ms. Barton, who resided in Glen Echo, MD, for the last 15 years of her life, is a national hero and a fitting role model to our developing young leaders today, both women and men. As the founder of the American Red Cross and as one of the early proponents of a free public school system, Clara Barton has certainly earned her place in our esteem. Ms. Barton is also remembered for her courage and foresight as an activist with Frederick Douglass and with Susan B. Anthony in the black civil rights movement and women's rights movement, respectively. Her home in Glen Echo—which also served as a dormitory, supply center, and first permanent headquarters for the American Red Cross—has been preserved for posterity as the Clara Barton Historic Site under the administration of the National Park Service. Certainly, redesignating a portion of the parkway so near home as the Clara Barton Parkway is not too great a salute to this outstanding woman's spirited commitment and lasting contributions to our Nation's people and to people throughout the world.

Renaming this particular parkway segment will also serve to alleviate much of the longstanding confusion resulting from the highway segments on both sides of the Potomac bearing identical names. I need not elaborate on the frustrations to which many motorists can testify who have mistakenly taken the wrong turn and found themselves on the wrong portion of the George Washington Parkway, on the wrong side of the river, and indeed even in the wrong State—during rush hour. Redesignating the D.C. and Maryland segments of this heavily traveled road as the Clara Barton Parkway will help to alleviate a good deal of this confusion.

I commend my distinguished colleague Congresswoman CONNIE MORELLA for her leadership in introducing and guiding H.R. 1310 toward passage. On September 14, 1989, a most informative hearing was conducted by the House Interior Subcommittee on National Parks and Public Lands to consider the impact of this legislation; and a wide range of testimony strongly favored the name change for this highway segment. Mr. Speaker, I join enthusiastically with Mrs. MORELLA, with Congresswoman BEVERLY BYRON, the bill's other original cosponsor, and with so many leading spokespeople for the region in urging my colleagues in the House to pass this legislation without further delay.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 1310.

The question was taken.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). Pursuant to clause 5, rule I, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, October 16, I was unexpectedly detained on business in the 19th District of Pennsylvania, and was unable to participate in activities on the floor of the House. Had I been present, however, I would have voted "yea" on House Concurrent Resolution 194, and "yea" on H.R. 1310.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, due to engagements in my district, I was unable to cast votes on Monday, October 16. If I had been present, I would have voted in favor of the following: House Concurrent Resolution 194, Support for the People of Colombia; H.R. 1310, designating the Clara Burton Parkway.

I was also not present on Tuesday, October 17. Had I voted, I would have voted in favor of the conference report on the 1990 Treasury-Postal Service appropriations bill.

PROVIDING FOR STUDY TO ADD ST. MARYS RIVER TO WILD AND SCENIC RIVERS SYSTEM

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 76) to amend the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act to study the eligibility of the St. Marys River in the States of Florida and Georgia for potential addition to the wild and scenic rivers system, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 76

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DESIGNATION AS STUDY RIVER.

Section 5(a) of the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act (16 U.S.C. 1276(a)) is amended by adding the following new paragraph at the end thereof:

"( ) ST. MARYS RIVER, FLORIDA AND GEORGIA.—The segement from its headwaters to the confluence of the Bells River.".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO].

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 76, the bill now under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 76, introduced by our colleague Representative CHARLES BENNETT, would provide for a wild and scenic river study of the St. Marys River in Florida and Georgia.

For most of its 120-mile length the St. Marys River forms the State boundary between northeast Florida and southeast Georgia. The river contains resource values that were judged significant in the 1982 nationwide rivers inventory prepared by the National Park Service. The inventory described the St. Marys as an attractive, clear, subtropical swamp river with varied and colorful flora and white sandbars. The list of plant and animal resources found along the twisting, serpentine river corridor is quite extensive, in fact, over 40 rare or endangered species have been identified within the St. Marys watershed; which I might add is one of the few largely undeveloped river watersheds remaining in the Eastern United States.

In hearings before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, the National Park Service and the other witnesses present were supportive of study designation for the St. Marys River. Based on the committee's review of the river and with the consultation of the sponsor and other interested parties, the legislation before the House today provides that the study terminate at the confluence of the Bells River, just west of St. Marys, GA. This would delete the final 4½ miles of the St. Marys River from study consideration. That section of the river is developed and has commercial river traffic, with occasional river dredging. It is extremely unlikely that segment would be eligible for wild and scenic designation in any case.

Mr. Speaker, the study provided by H.R. 76 will provide the information necessary to make a complete and careful assessment of the St. Marys' potential for addition to the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System. I want to take this opportunity to commend the legislation's sponsor, Representative BENNETT. He has been a forceful and tireless advocate for conservation initiatives in this region. I also appreciate the input I received from our other colleagues in the area, whose districts include portions of the St. Marys River. I believe the bill, as amended, is a good proposal and one that merits our favorable consideration.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 76, to study the eligibility of the St. Marys River in the States of Florida and Georgia for potential addition to the Wild and Scenic Rivers System.

As the subcommittee chairman has explained, the St. Marys River traverses approximately 120 miles from its headwaters in the Okefenokee Swamp before flowing in the Atlantic Ocean. A portion of the river serves as a boundary between the States of Florida and Georgia and its mouth forms the entrance to the Kings Bay Naval Submarine Base. The river's corridor is heavily forested and remains primarily undeveloped. In fact, it is one of only a few remaining pristine blackwater river systems in Florida. The 1982 nationwide rivers inventory, by the National Park Service, concluded the St. Marys River was worthy of further study for potential preservation.

H.R. 76 is sponsored by my colleague from Florida. Representative BENNETT, who deserves to be commended for his efforts on this legislation. Although the corridor of the St. Marys is primarily private land, we have been assured that Mr. BENNETT has been working with all interested and affected parties who apparently have no objections to the proposed study. In addition, the administration supports H.R. 76 and has indicated that the study would cost only about $175,000.

H.R. 76 is a good bill which enjoys broad-based support. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to approve this legislation.

□ 1310

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

As has been indicated the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BENNETT], the dean of the delegation, has been active on this and other issues affecting his area. He has personally worked hard for the park designation of Port Caroline. After a good deal of work the last Congress passed the Timucuan National Preserve, which is a substantial area preserved, and again the gentleman brings to us a bill that is important and timely with regard to the type of development that is taking place. We have a chance here to study and perhaps go on to preserve a 120-mile watershed in the Eastern United States.

It is because of his leadership and tenacity in working with the Members and for his constituents that this bill is here. I believe that this type of vision, this type of devotion, is one which will inure to the benefit of future generations.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. BENNETT], the dean of the Florida delegation.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I express deep appreciation to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] and the chairman of the full committee. I appreciate the staff and all they have done to bring this legislation before us.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 76, as amended, my bill to study the St. Marys River for possible inclusion in the Wild and Scenic River System. The St. Marys is a beautiful and wild river and forms the border between Florida and Georgia.

I recently went by boat down and upriver from a central spot and have visited many other parts of it during my lifetime, years ago. I worked for the enactment of the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act, which is designed to help protect from degradation selected U.S. rivers. Such rivers are to possess outstanding scenic, recreational, geological, fish, wildlife, historical, and cultural values. As I looked out at the river on that recent day and reflected on what it means to the area, it seemed clear to me that the Wild and Scenic River Act could have been drafted just for the St. Marys.

The St. Marys River is an attractive subtropical waterway with many unusual characteristics. It is one of the few remaining pristine blackwater river systems in Florida. Hardwood and pine/palmetto forests dominate the upper reaches of the river, gradually turning to a marshy estuarine environment as the stream approaches Cumberland Sound.

Endangered red-cockaded woodpeckers, peregrine falcons, and West Indian manatees live in and around the St. Marys. Threatened species along the river include ospreys, American oystercatchers, Florida black bears, bald eagles, and Atlantic sturgeon.

As the northern boundary of subtropical Florida, it is a middle ground between the varied flora of southeastern Georgia and the transitional botanical species of northern Florida. The water is clear and contrasts strikingly with strips of white sand. It drains from the Okefenokee Swamp in southeast Georgia and meanders east until it empties into the Atlantic Ocean.

Today, the river is relatively undeveloped. Traffic is mostly in the lowest reaches. The countryside bordering the river is mostly all flat pine country interspersed with hardwoods and cattle grazing pastures, and with human populations rather sparse. It is not until the lower reaches that population comes into focus, particularly on the Florida border. Substantial commercial utilization concentrates on the vicinity of the coastal towns of St. Marys and Fernandina. Upstream traffic is more generally recreational, for which the St. Marys has good future potential.

Not only is the St. Marys impressive from the standpoint of environment and recreation, but it also is a river of historic significance, and reminders of a colorful chronology are numerous along the lower segment.

The little town of Kings Ferry, FL, is where the road from British Savannah ran to Spanish St. Augustine, and a number of old houses are near the river. A mile or so downstream is where the British Fort Tonyn stood and was captured by the patriots in 1778. White Oak Plantation has left us some tabby remains further downriver, a plantation owned by Zephaniah Kingsley, the principal slave importer in the early 1800's in Florida. The colonial Spanish established missions in the vicinity of the St. Marys River in the 16th century, and a mission recently excavated on Amelia Island dates to the 17th century. In 1812, an American invasion force crossed the river into Spanish territory and occupied Fernandina, proclaiming it part of the United States; however, the American Government disavowed this action and the area returned to the Spanish. The St. Marys River and the town of Fernandina were long associated with pirates and other disreputable elements of Southern colonial history. Nearby Fort Clinch State Park and the Fernandina Beach Historical District provide places of historical interest close to the river corridor. At least eight sovereign flags have flown over the river in its long history dating back to the mid-1500's. So, it is clearly a historic river.

It is so easy to look at something as pristine, beautiful, and important as the St. Marys and say: "No need to worry; it will always be this way." That's not true, particularly in this case. As the population continues to increase in the south Georgia-north Florida area, there is bound to be more development pressure and pollution problems. Kings Bay Naval Submarine Base in Camden County, GA, has caused a population boom in the Kingsland-St. Marys area, and development is sprawling from Jacksonville. In fact, concern has been already raised about fish in the river. Florida health officials are planning to test more fish after potentially harmful levels of mercury were found in some initial samples.

Right now, however, the St. Marys is in relatively good shape. That might not always be the case, and we should act now before something bad happens. The National Park Service in 1982 issued its nationwide rivers inventory, which included the St. Marys and clearly demonstrated why the river should be further investigated for preservation possibilities.

A Federal wild and scenic river study could play an important role in bringing everyone together at one table to discuss the river and reach some conclusions as to how it should be managed to protect it from the devastations of modern-day society. I think consensus can be reached on what to do about the river and that the various local governments will eventually sign off on a workable wild and scenic river plan. We need to get this study through, however, to bring this all to a head.

Again, I thank Chairman VENTO and the ranking minority member RON MARLENEE for moving this bill quickly through the committee process. I beleive Senator FOWLER plans to introduce a companion in the Senate, so it looks good for Senate passage as well.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ROWLAND], whose district adjoins the study area.

Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO]: During the course of the study, would private property owners be able to carry on their normal business activities? For example, would they be able to harvest trees or construct buildings and those kinds of things they normally would be doing?

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, yes, they would be able to continue on with normal activities that they would be doing during this period. It is a 3-year study and a 3-year period for Congress to act. This envisions a period of time for Congress to act. The gentleman from Georgia knows the other restrictions, but generally normal activities can proceed.

Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for that explanation.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 76, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). Is a second demanded?

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER].

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I bring before the House a bill, H.R. 1622, entitled the "Copyright Fees and Technical Amendments Act of 1989."

The purpose of H.R. 1622 is to change the fee schedule of the Copyright Office to account for the inflation that has occurred since the schedule was established in 1978. Briefly stated, the bill amends section 708(a) of the Copyright Act of 1976 by doubling the fee schedule. The bill also grants the Register of Copyrights the authority to adjust the fee schedule by regulation solely to reflect, at 5-year intervals, increases in the Consumer Price Index. Last, the bill makes technical amendments to the Copyright Act to correct minor errors in recently enacted public laws. With one exception, all of the amendments correct errors of cross-references to section numbering or paragraph designation.

H.R. 1622 is a good government bill, that was proposed by the Copyright Office during an oversight hearing before my subcommittee, the Subcommittee on Courts, Intellectual Property, and the Administration of Justice. The bill is not only supported by the Copyright Office and the Library of Congress, but has also garnered support from a broad cross section of the copyright community, including the Recording Industry Association of America, the Motion Picture Association of America, the Computer and Business Equipment Manufacturers Association, the National School Boards Association, the Authors League of America, and various bar associations.

H.R. 1622 is a bipartisan measure, with the strong support of the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, Mr. MOORHEAD. I thank Mr. MOORHEAD for his assistance.

The Register of Copyrights, Ralph Oman, has referred to copyright registration as the best deal in government, and I agree with him. But, since 1976, inflation has cut the real price of fees by 50 percent. Today, the fees must be raised, or services diminished.

The Library of Congress does not recommend a 100-percent fee-based registration system, since the Office performs valuable services not directly related to maintenance of the public record.

A broad consensus for the bill was developed because the Register has promised that a significant portion of the additional earned fee revenues will be used to improve the Office's services to authors, copyright owners, and the public. My subcommittee, in its oversight capacity, will hold the Register to his promise.

If the fee bill is enacted into law, the Office will continue the international copyright institute program in order to encourage protection of American works abroad. This is a successful program that the ranking minority member, Mr. MOORHEAD and I helped to start. Further, the Office will reduce the processing time for issuance of a certificate of registration and will decrease the excess work-on-hand in cataloging the registration records. In addition, the Copyright Office will reinstitute the mailing list service to inform interested members of the public of Office regulations and other copyright developments. Moreover, the Office will automate the card catalog of pre-1978 registrations. Finally, the Register is actively considering a regulatory change that would allow group registration of magazines, journals, and newspapers. Under current law, the Register is authorized to set a fee for a special service like group registration. This fee could be substantially less than if the group of works was registered individually. I am highly supportive of the Register's initiative in this regard.

In conclusion, H.R. 1622 is a necessary piece of legislation that, as is the requirement of all intellectual property legislation, will benefit the public.

I urge an "aye" vote for H.R. 1622.

□ 1320

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I commend our subcommittee chairman, Mr. KASTENMEIER, for his work on this legislation, which I am a cosponsor. Also, our chairman, Mr. BROOKS, and our ranking member, Mr. FISH, have been very helpful in bringing this bill to the floor.

H.R. 1622 would provide an increase in copyright fees charged those who register their copyrights and in return receive the protection of life of the author plus 50 years. A sum of $20 is a small price to pay for this type of protection. Ten years ago we found to our surprise that the Patent and Trademark Office was in serious trouble. It took us a number of years before we got that Office back on its feet. We had to substantially increase the filing fees for patents and trademarks over the objections of a number of organizations.

Fortunately, the Copyright Office is not in the condition the Patent Office was 10 years ago. But my point is that these agencies must have the support and resources necessary to do the type of job we expect. What concerns me for example, is that since fiscal year 1979, the Copyright Office workload has increased 42 percent, while during the same period the staffing level of that Office has decreased 23 percent. This decrease occurred not because of modernization or efficiency but because of less and less money available to get the job done.

This is too important an agency for us not to provide the resources necessary to do the job we expect.

I urge your support for H.R. 1622.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], the ranking Republican on the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the subcommittee chairman, Mr. KASTENMEIER, and the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, Mr. MOORHEAD, for processing this legislation which is so very important to the successful operation of the Copyright Office. Most of us on the Judiciary Committee have had the need to use this Office in responding to constituent questions and in drafting legislation.

Enactment of H.R. 1622 would return the Copyright Office to its historic ratio of earned fees versus office expenses. It would mean that the Copyright Office would earn approximately $14 million in fees to set off the approximately $19 million it takes to run the Office.

Enactment of this proposal, as has been pointed out, would raise the basic registration fee to $20 from the present $10. At $20, the registration fee is still a fantastic bargain.

I urge a favorable vote on H.R. 1622.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume in order to further acknowledge the contributions of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. We are delighted now to have him as a member of the subcommittee. He has had a longstanding interest in the Copyright Office and in intellectual property, and he makes considerable contribution to this and to other legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. McDERMOTT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 1622, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 1622, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3045) to amend chapters 5 and 9 of title 17, United States Code, to clarify that States, instrumentalities of States, and officers and employees of States acting in their official capacity, are subject to suit in Federal court by any person for infringement of copyright and infringement of exclusive rights in mask works, and that all the remedies can be obtained in such suit that can be obtained in a suit against a private person or against other public entities.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER].

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, in 1976, Congress enacted the Copyright Act, which completely revised our copyright laws. One of the law's central premises was that a uniform system should be established. Pursuant to this premise, the Congress decided that, in general, defendants in copyright infringement suits would be treated equally, no matter what their status. In other words, if States infringed copyrights, the Congress intended that they should be held fully liable, for money damages as well as other relief.

However, in 1985, the Supreme Court held in Atascadero State Hosptial versus Scanlon that unless Congress explicitly and unambiguously abrogates the 11th amendment, States are immune from suits for money damages. While Atascadero was not a copyright case, it raised analogous questions about the copyright law. In fact, a number of Federal circuits have relied on Atascadero in deciding that, while Congress did intend to apply all copyright infringement remedies to the States, the language of the statute is not sufficiently clear. They have therefore held that the States are immune.

Because of these decisions, copyright owners are often unable to obtain fair and full relief when their copyrights are infringed. Injunctive relief, which is still available, prevents only future violations. It does not compensate for past harm, as monetary damages do.

Pursuant to these decisions, copyright owners have also been denied statutory damages and attorneys' fees. These kinds of recoveries are often essential to protect the rights of individual authors and small entrepreneurs, and to enable them to obtain counsel. During consideration of H.R. 3045, some in the educational community suggested that we should make an exception to the law to exempt States from liability for statutory damages and attorneys' fees. The concerns that the educational community has raised were specifically addressed in the 1976 revision effort. In the interests of the uniformity and equity that are essential premises of the Copyright Act, these concerns were rejected. I believe that the agreements made at that time continue to be vaid and should be supported now.

H.R. 3045, the Copyright Remedy Clarification Act, will encourage the creative process that benefits us all. Unless the legitimate rights of copyright owners are protected, many authors will not take the risks that creative endeavors often entail.

H.R. 3045 simply clarifies what Congress intended in the 1976 Copyright Act. When States infringe copyrights, they are liable for money damages. It does so by incorporating certain standards set forth by the Supreme Court in its last term. These standards must be met in order effectively and constitutionally to abrogate the 11th amendment.

Another constitutional question that arose during the committee's examination of the 11th amendment has also been resolved. It is clear that Congress is constitutionally empowered to abrogate that amendment pursuant to its 14th amendment powers. However, Congress' powers to enact the copyright laws arise under article 1 of the Constitution. Until the Supreme Court's last term, it was unclear whether Congress had the power to abrogate the 11th amendment pursuant to article I. Last June, the Court decided five cases that led the committee to conclude that Congress does have such power. This potential constitutional obstacle to H.R. 3045 has therefore also been eliminated.

The Register of Copyrights and the administration recommend that the Congress enact H.R. 3045. In addition, a wide range of parties with diverse interests in the copyright law support this bill.

In short, through various judicial decisions issued after the copyright law was enacted, an important loophole in that law was created. H.R. 3045 fills that loophole. It clarifies that the intent of Congress in 1976 was to authorize imposition on the States of all available copyright infringement remedies, and that this continues to be our intent.

I thank my colleagues on the subcommittee, and in particular my colleague CARLOS MOORHEAD, for their strong support of this legislation. I urge my colleagues in the House to support it as well.

□ 1330

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to concur in the remarks of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Courts, Intellectual Property and Administration of Justice, Mr. KASTENMEIER, and indicate my strong support for H.R. 3045, the Copyright Remedy Clarification Act. I would also like to commend the ranking member of the full Judicary Committee, Mr. FISH, as well as other members of the subcommittee for taking the initiative on this important issue.

The need for a careful study of the law in this area and indeed for the legislation was prompted by the Supreme Court's decision in Atascadero State Hospital v. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234 (1985). In Atacadero the Supreme Court held that in order for Congress to abrogate State's immunity in a statute it must specifically include States in the defendant class. After Atascadero, several district courts addressing the issue found that States were immune from suit for damages in copyright infringement cases. These courts rather than looking at the Copyright Act is a whole, focused instead on the language that Congress had written in establishing the defendant class in the copyright act and found that congressional intent was less than clear with regard to whether or not the States were covered.

It was back on August 3, 1987, that the chairman and I wrote to Ralph Oman, the Register of Copyrights, requesting that the Copyright Office conduct a study of the copyright liability of the States and the 11th amendment. The Copyright Office report for which I commend Mr. Oman and his fine, staff was submitted on June 27, 1988, and concluded that:

• • • Congress intended to hold States responsible under the Federal copyright law, and that copyright owners have demonstrated that they will suffer immediate harm if they are unable to sue infringing States in Federal court for money damages.

Using the Copyright Office report as a starting point, the Courts Subcommittee held 2 days of hearings on H.R. 3045. The thust of the majority of the testimony presented to the subcommittee concurred with the conclusion of the Copyright Office report and urged Congress to act quickly before the problem became greater. I was not a member of the Courts Subcommittee when it considered the 1976 revision of the Copyright Office. It is clear to me that Congress in fact intended to cover the States under the 1976 act and H.R. 3045 is merely a reaffirmation of the that intent. It is also important to note that H.R. 3045 will in no way change the substantive rights of copyright owners. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3045 has strong support from the vast majority of the copyright community and accordingly, I urge my colleagues' support for the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 3045, which would amend the Copyright Act to provide that a State may be sued in Federal court for infringement. This is merely a reaffirmation of Congress' original intent when it enacted the 1976 revision of the Copyright Act, but it is important we do so, and I commend the chairman of the Subcommittee on Courts, Intellectual Property and the Administration of Justice, Mr. KASTENMEIER, as well as the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, Mr. MOORHEAD, for addresing this issue in a timely manner.

Up until the Supreme Court's decision in Atascadero State Hospital V. Scanlon, 473 U.S. 234 (1985), courts had held that State governments were subject to suit for damages for copyright infringement. However, in Atascadero the Supreme Court enunciated a very stringent legislative intent standard that Congress must meet if it wishes to abrogate State sovereign immunity. Applying the standard set out in Atascadero lower courts began holding that Congress' intent was no sufficiently clear in the 1976 act and therefore States were immune from suit for damages in copyright infringement cases.

The thrust of H.R. 3045 is to make unmistakably clear Congress' original intent in a manner consistent with the Atascadero decision. The legislation has strong support and I urge my colleagues' support for its passage.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. MCDERMOTT). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIR] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3045.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks and include therein extraneous material on H.R. 3045, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GEKAS. The suspensions that were listed for today which were not heard for one reason or another, can they be rescheduled for tomorrow as part of the suspension calendar originally placed for tomorrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that is exactly what is expected to happen regarding H.R. 2806 and Senate Concurrent Reslution 61. They will be on tomorrow's calendar.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for that explanation.

□ 1340

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. MCDERMOTT). Subject to the return of the House to legislative business, the Chair will now move to special orders.

ANOTHER CONTINUING RESOLUTION WOULD MAKE CONGRESS A REPEAT OFFENDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, last year, or perhaps it was the previous year, when we underwent the crisis of a continuing resolution, we wound up at 3 o'clock in the morning on the day before Christmas and presented to then-President Reagan a bill containing thousands of provisions about which we knew very little and which he was compelled to sign into law because there was no alternative because otherwise the Government would grind to a halt if he did not sign it. We found out later then, just like we did at other times in similar circumstances, that secret provisions, public interest provisons, personal interest provisions, and all kinds of goodies were contained in that mammoth piece of legislation which had to be undone or which had to be submitted at least to public criticism.

We should not be indulging in that continuing resolution kind of dilemma that we face every year. I have phrased it in previous presentations as a syndrome in which the Congress of the United States is a repeat offender.

The Congress passed a law a long time ago saying that October 1 is the deadline, that it is and should be the deadline for completing the budget of the United States. Who violates that law? The Congress of the United States. And because of so many instances in which that violation has been repeated, Congress is indeed a repeat offender.

I introduced a piece of legislation a few years ago which I think could help to resolve this problem and which will come before the Rules Committee very shortly when it reconvenes for the purpose of seeing whether we can extend the concurrent resolution even beyond the state to which we have appended it already.

My proposition is a simple one, and because it makes common sense, I know it does not have a chance of passing. Nevertheless, I am going to try to go before the Rules Committee to make it in order. It simply states as follows: That if the Congress of the United States should fail to pass a budget by October 1 in any given fiscal year, then automatically the budget will return to the previous year's appropriations for a full year.

What will that do? That will end for all time the crisis management that we have to indulge in for the 25-day period or the 10-day period or the 6-month period in which we have a continuing resolution. That will allow the Congress in its own good time to adopt a budget if it wants to enact a new budget. It cannot harm that procedure. And guess what? It will save money because last year's appropriations, no matter what they are, have to be within proportions which do not call for increases in the rate of spending or increases in spending at large.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am asking to have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reflect my intent to go before the Rules Committee, and I ask all the Members who will learn of this move on our part to support this endeavor so that we can put Congress on parole at least from its own offenses and not allow this to occur again.

NEW SPOUSAL IMPOVERISHMENT PROTECTION FOR MEDICARE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, one of the best features of the Medicare catastrophic coverage package was the protection it offered to prevent spousal impoverishment. Before catastrophic, beneficiaries' families were often forced to spend down their assets to pay for medical care; healthy wives and husbands were left with little or no resources so that their ill spouses could qualify for financial support.

Fortunately, even the movement to repeal catastrophic recognized the need to retain spousal impoverishment protection. In eight States, however, this protection will overlap community property laws already on the books. Today, I am introducing legislation which modifies the spousal impoverishment protection by permitting Medicare beneficiaries in community property States to use their own States' laws to determine the level of community assets which a healthy spouse may retain. In no case will the new level of protection fall below the current minimum.

RECESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of Thursday, October 12, 1989, the Chair declares the House in recess until 4:30 p.m.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 46 minutes p.m.) the House stood in recess until 4:30 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. ROSE) at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p.m.

□ 1630

Mr. Speaker, my name was inadvertently added as a cosponsor of several joint and concurrent resolutions, by reason of confusion between my name and that of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. CAMPBELL]. I, therefore, ask unanimous consent to withdraw my name as a cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 373, House Joint Resolution 106, and House Concurrent Resolution 57.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I simply want to identify our colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. BATES], as the author and principal sponsor of House Joint Resolution 380.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 380

Whereas patient account management personnel provide patients with important and relevant information, guidance, and assistance to understand and manage medical bill, the complex systems of Medicare, Medicaid, insurance coverage, and health care reimbursement; and

Whereas patient account management personnel are part of the financial backbone of the health care system in the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 4, 1989, is designated as "Patient Account Management Day", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

THE DAY OF SEQUESTRATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I take this time today to address a very important subject, one that is timely, because today is the day of sequestration. It is the day that those of us who have followed the budget reform process for a number of years have been waiting on.

I see my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN], the author of the Budget and Impoundment Act of 1974, is here with us, and I think that he would agree with me that the Budget and Impoundment Act has not achieved any of the things that it set out to achieve. It has achieved sequestration, and some would argue that that is possitive. But the fact is that with sequestration the budget numbers that are included as a basis for sequestration are arbitrary, and that in 1992, when the budget is allegedly to be balanced, there will be in fact no balance, but there will be about a $300 billion deficit.

There is much talk that the Congress should enact a Truth in Budgeting Act, and I propose at this time that the House take the initiative to do so. We cannot have reform until we have the truth, and until the American people know the truth, they will not know the seriousness of the problem that faces us.

I have introduced two bills, first, H.R. 3411, which deals with the definition of "deficit." It would be the first step of a two-step process that would change the definition of "deficit" to include all the money that the Government owes. That is what we would tell the American people. Under the present system, we do not tell the people how much the Government owes. It is argued that those who are sophisticated and follow the budget know that the deficit is about $100 billion more than what we owe.

That would be the first step. It would be an easy, painless step for Congress to take. It requires no courage because it does nothing other than tell the American people the truth about the deficit.

Now, the next step would take a little courage. That is H.R. 1420. That would reform the process itself and get into the numbers and determine what the deficit level should be over the next several years. That is simply it.

Those bills are now pending before the Committee on Government Operations. Those Members who wish to tell the American people the truth about the deficit are welcome to join with us, and I invite their support for this important initiative.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, let me say that I join with the gentleman, and may I say, since my name was mentioned here, that the Budget Act is completely opposite to that which I recommend.

May I say further that in 1974 we did have a study. I was a senior member of that committee, and what we set out to do was to let the Congress control entitlements and backdoor spending. Since 1974 entitlements and backdoor spending have increased 4.7 times, and the discretionary fund for the rest of the Government ends up about $157 billion out of a budget of $1,300 billion.

So may I say, Mr. Speaker, that while the gentleman is completely correct, what they are doing now and what is simply going on now is completely opposite to the intent that we had in our recommendation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for his contribution, and I repeat to my colleagues in the House that this requires no courage. It only requires a redefinition of the word, "deficit," in the Budget Act. It would require us to count it all and to tell the American people how much our Government owes.

VETERANS SUFFER FROM POST-TRAUMATIC STRESS DISORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JONTZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. JONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address the subject of post-traumatic stress disorder, and I am joined today by my distinguished colleague from Indiana's Eighth Congressional District, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. FRANK MCCLOSKEY.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana joined the Oversight Investigations Subcommittee of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs in a hearing that we conducted in Huntington, IN, on September 15 and presented very important testimony to that subcommittee at that time.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MCCLOSKEY].

Mr. MCCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JONTZ] for arranging this special order, but, more importantly, for his continuing leadership on the Committee on Veterans' Affairs serving the very, very important causes of our Nation's veterans.

As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JONTZ] mentioned, we recently had a very enlightening hearing, and there was a hearing in Fort Wayne, attended also by the gentlewoman from Indiana [Ms. LONG], who is also a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, and also the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. LANE EVANS, both of whom should be commended. We had very revealing testimony at those hearings as to our concerns with post-traumatic stress disorder.

Mr. Speaker, The Department of Veterans Affairs is doing this Nation's Vietnam veterans a great disservice with its lack of consistent and predictable policy in dealing with the treatment, services, and benefits available to veterans who suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder.

The agency's current policy is so unpredictable and inconsistent as to be nearly nonexistent. It can be compared to throwing darts. This lack of policy, coupled with a widespread indifference within the agency to its effects on the veteran is appalling. It continues the war for many veterans despite nearly 20 years since combat involvement in Vietnam. A systematic and comprehensive policy is direly needed.

I would like to give a casework perspective of what these veterans are facing. Since 1983 my office has worked on more than 500 veterans cases. Over 10 percent of these cases involve claims for service connection or treatment for post-traumatic stress disorder. These cases are, by nature, the longest running cases among veterans' concerns.

One veteran's claim is denied for precisely the same reason that another veteran is awarded a service-connected designation. No other veterans casework area is as uncertain, unpredictable, and time-consuming as this.

Let's take the case of a constituent of mine whom I'll call Joe Smith. Joe is a Marine who served a year in Vietnam as an aircraft radar systems technician. He was awarded a number of medals and awards for his service in Vietnam. These include the Air Crew Insignia, awarded only to Marines who have engaged enemy aircraft, or served in operations against an enemy fortified position.

Shortly after his return, Joe began experiencing symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder—flashbacks, recurring nightmares, and began isolating himself from family and friends. In 1981, Joe—after numerous visits to VA facilities and vet centers—applied for service-connected disability benefits. His case was complicated by unavailable combat logs, which were eventually declassified and made available after my office intervened.

Despite Joe's tenacity, the diligence of several congressional staffers, and evidence contained in his combat records, he has been denied a total of seven times. These denials have been made with total disregard for the fact that even the Department of Veterans Affairs own psychiatrists and vets center personnel have diagnosed his condition as post-traumatic stress disorder.

About a month ago, Joe's claim was again denied. The Board of Veterans' Appeals doesn't deny that Joe suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder, merely that it is service-connected. Given his combat records and service awards, I find this ludicrous.

In another case, the Board of Veterans' Appeals ruled that a veteran suffered from a personality disorder with antisocial behavior, not post-traumatic-stress disorder. This diagnosis was made despite the fact that a VA psychologist stated that if anyone suffers from the condition, it is this individual.

This type of diagnosis is not uncommon. The agency will frequently deny a claim based on a condition which is itself a symptom of post- traumatic stress disorder. It is absurd that such a diagnosis could even be made, refuting their own personnel.

If the VA cannot abide by decisions and findings of their own personnel, who is competent to make determinations within the agency?

Numerous other post-traumatic stress disorder cases are pending in my office. I will summarize by saying that these other cases are similar to the two I've mentioned. Waiting for the declassification of combat logs needed to make their case, long delays while waiting for a decision or appeal of an adverse decision, a frequent finding of symptoms as cause, and bureaucratic red tape compound this problem. To tell a Vietnam combat veteran his condition is unrelated to wartime service, or to deny claims based on the fact that there is a personality disorder is just plain wrong.

Two programs within the Department of Veterans Affairs deserve special mention and praise. The Combat Veterans Treatment Program, and the Vet Center Program provide treatment to veterans afflicted with post-traumatic-stress disorder.

Vet centers are an invaluable resource for Vietnam veterans having readjustment problems. The centers offer counseling and programs designed specifically for post-traumatic stress disorder veterans. The vet center in Evansville, IN has been praised by many, many veterans who have benefited from its services.

A common thread that runs through nearly every case is the veterans' recognition of the need for treatment. Many veterans get this help from the Combat Veterans Treatment Program.

Since its inception at the VA hospital at Marion, IN, this long term, intensive, inpatient program teaches veterans to cope with the stresses of day-to-day living. They learn to manage flashbacks, and the rage and depression associated with post-traumatic stress disorder. Many credit the program with saving their lives. Unfortunately, this highly acclaimed program has been scaled back at the Marion hospital because of staffing and budgetary problems. The program can now only accommodate just over one-fourth of the patients previously treated. It is sad that as the incidence and awareness of this ailment increase, the most beneficial treatment program available is decreased.

Another disconcerting component of the inpatient treatment involves a serious catch-22 after dismissal. Since many of these veterans are not technically service-connected, their access to any necessary medication following discharge from an inpatient is limited. Most veterans are given a 30-day supply, but because their disability is not classified as service-connected, the prescription cannot be refilled on an outpatient basis. This essentially puts the treatment—and the veteran—back to square 1. It seems a tragic waste of resources to provide such a fragmented and incomplete regimen.

This trend of widespread indifference to post-traumatic stress disorder within the Department of Veterans Affairs must stop. For years the attitude has been to question the very essence of proof of post-traumatic stress disorder. The burden of proof rests on the veteran, yet the agency frequently denies the existence of proof.

What is needed is a more rational, predictable and comprehensive approach to providing benefits, services, and treatment to these veterans. Three bills are pending before the committee which would go far in establishing such a system.

Congressman JIM JONTZ has introduced a bill which provides a comprehensive plan for the improved treatment of veterans with post-traumatic stress disorder, by making treatment more accessible.

Another bill, introduced by Congressman SAM GEJDENSON of Connecticut, calls for standardizing the criteria for treatment and diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder.

Treatment for any condition is not readily forthcoming without a service-connected designation. This is not an easy task given the experience of a number of veterans from the Evansville, IN, area. A third bill, introduced by Congressman ROBERT KASTENMEIER would provide a presumption-of-service connection to Vietnam theatre veterans afflicted with post-traumatic stress disorder. This measure would provide a standardization, or as some would believe, creation, of criteria for determining a service connection.

I am pleased to lend my support to these bills and urge my colleagues to do the same. The Vietnam veterans of this Nation deserve no less. Thank you.

□ 1720

Mr. JONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MCCLOSKEY] for his participation today, for sharing his experiences with the casework in his office and also for his participation in our hearing on September 15. I know that the gentleman is a former member of our Committee on Veterans' Affairs in the House, and he remains dedicated to the cause of veterans. All veterans in our State are appreciative of his service.

Mr. Speaker, the obstacles that our Nation's Vietnam veterans have faced in getting the Government to respond to the problem of agent orange are well known. But what isn't as well understood or appreciated is that fact that hundreds of thousands of Vietnam veterans—and a significant number of veterans of earlier conflicts, too—are struggling with what is too often Government indifference to another health problem of serious magnitude: posttraumatic stress disorder [PTSD].

The Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations of the Veterans' Affairs Committee under the chairmanship of my colleague LANE EVANS recently held a field hearing on the services, benefits, and treatment provided by Hoosier veterans suffering from PTSD. Along with our colleague JILL LONG, we traveled to Huntington, IN, to hear from veterans, DVA officials, and others with an interest in PTSD. I'd like to commend the fine work of LANE EVANS and JILL LONG on this hearing, and I'd also like to thank our colleague FRANK MCCLOSKEY for testifying at Huntington.

We also held a forum on PTSD for Vietnam veterans at the Seventh Annual Vietnam Veterans Reunion in Kokomo, IN. There we heard from over 30 veterans on their personal experiences with PTSD, the problems they are encountering with the DVA, and listened to their recommendations on what we can do here in Congress to make sure these veterans are getting the treatment and services that they deserve.

First, Mr. Speaker, I'd like to address the question of how this problem has evolved. Homecomings and counseling usually furnish vets with a transition from stress, even severe stress known as "shellshock" in World War I and "combat fatigue" in World War II. But there was no homecoming for many Vietnam veterans—no debriefing, and little counseling. Many vets returned in civilian dress, and the wounded were often returned from a Vietnamese jungle to a stateside hospital within 24 hours. While most Vietnam veterans readjusted back into civilian life without many problems, others had difficulties in reestablishing family ties, educational and employment careers, and simply placing their Vietnam experience in some understandable context.

Beyond the usual stresses of war, the Vietnam war was surrounded by many extraordinary circumstances—problems in distinguishing the enemy from the nonenemy, ambiguous objectives, widespread terrorism, and unusual brutality. Perhaps the greatest inhibiting factor was the extent of the national debate about the value, conduct and meaning of the war.

This left many Vietnam veterans alienated. Most didn't join the veterans' service groups and more stayed away from the Government and from the VA. As with many issues and problems surrounding the Vietnam war, PTSD has been grossly misunderstood by the public.

At the forum on PTSD, I, along with my colleagues and fellow Veterans' Affairs Committee members JILL LONG and LANE EVANS heard from a wife of a PTSD sufferer who told us about the lack of public and media understanding of the disorder. After her husband had put on his combat fatigues and put on camouflage face paint, he went into the woods to "relive" his Vietnam experience. The headline in the hometown paper the next day led the public to believe that he was some sort of terrorist, and ignored the fact that this type of behavior could be attributed to PTSD.

PTSD, unfortunately, was not even formally recognized by health professionals until 1980—a decade after many of our men and women had left Vietnam.

A long awaited study, undertaken by the Research Triangle Institute under contract with the DVA, concludes that as many as 15 percent of Vietnam theater veterans are presently suffering from PTSD, and another 11 percent have some effects of PTSD.

This number, much higher than previously estimated, equals over 800,000 of the 3.1 million men and women who served in Vietnam.

□ 1730

Over 479,000 men and women currently have full-blown PTSD. The study also showed that rates are much higher among Hispanic—27.9 percent—and black—20.6 percent—war veterans than among white war veterans—13.7 percent.

But what the DVA has to offer veterans with PTSD is far from adequate to meet the needs that exist. Only 10 percent of the Vietnam veterans who now have PTSD have been treated by the VA in the last year.

The 16 inpatient treatment facilities which exist offer varying degrees of treatment. Only two of the units have been funded through the central DVA office. The rest, such as the recently reopened unit at the Marion VAMC in the Fifth Congressional District of Indiana which I represent, were created from existing resources and exist on a very tenuous basis given the funding crisis in the VA health care system.

In Indiana alone, they are estimated to be around 10,000 veterans suffering from PTSD. Only 18 received treatment from the Fort Wayne VAMC in 1988, and just 19 at the Indianapolis VAMC. While the inpatient PTSD unit at the Marion VAMC and the four vet centers in the State pick up some of the slack, these numbers are still very low, and I imagine that they could be applied nationwide.

Another issue is outreach. Vet centers were designed to reach out to Vietnam veterans with readjustment problems and give them the help that they need to get back on their feet. While they do a good job in my opinion, there is still a lot to be done if only 10 percent of those with PTSD are getting treatment from the VA. Many veterans don't realize that they have PTSD or are not aware of the help that is available. We heard from one veteran in Kokomo who didn't realize that the flashbacks and other problems that he was having were in fact symptoms of a disease until he stumbled across a pamphlet on PTSD said, "Hey, that's me."

Many more veterans are afraid of the stigma attached to PTSD—crazed veterans and all—and have been reluctant to come forward because of the likely repercussions to come from their employer or their friends.

Even more reluctant to come forward are active duty personnel. A recent study of Pentagon officers who served in Vietnam showed that 20 percent of these officers display symptoms of PTSD. Many more are expected to experience "delayed" PTSD, or symptoms of PTSD that begin appearing after leaving the military service. We need to make sure that there is a better awareness within the military regarding treating active duty personnel with PTSD.

At the hearing and at the forum, we also heard from families of PTSD sufferers as to the problems and lack of attention that they receive from the DVA. Part of the healing process, according to clinical PTSD specialists, involves helping the family as a whole. The RTI study included interviews with spouses of Vietnam veterans who revealed that PTSD has had a negative impact not only on the veterans' own lives, but also on the lives of their spouses and children.

The basic problems of coming back to children you don't know and families that have gone ahead without you, perhaps compounded by joblessness and alienation, have led to many problems for veterans with PTSD and their families. If a veteran does get admitted on an inpatient basis, he returns from treatment a different person—alienated again. The cycle can go on and on. It would be much more effective for the VA to include family participation in the healing process, rather than admitting and readmitting the affected veteran time after time.

While there should be no doubt in anyone's mind that PTSD is a service-related disability, a relatively small amount of veterans with PTSD are receiving benefits for their disability. According to the Indiana Regional Office of the VA, however, only 269 of the estimated 10,000 Hoosier veterans with PTSD are receiving disability compensation.

According to testimony that we heard at the hearing, diagnostic examinations for PTSD only involve the veteran, and are often completed in 20 to 30 minutes. It is the opinion of clinical psychologists that it takes at least 2 to 3 hours with a veteran and his or her family to make and accurate diagnosis. My colleague FRANK MCCLOSKEY pointed out the problems that his caseworkers are having in securing treatment and benefits for veterans with PTSD, saying that one veteran was given a disability rating for the same reason that another one was denied.

Perhaps this difficulty in securing favorable disability determinations relates to another problem that disturbs me about the VA's attitude toward PTSD. If anyone should believe that PTSD is a bona fide, legitimate mental disorder caused or triggered by combat or combat-related experience, it should be the VA. But that is not the impression I have received from testimony at our hearing or from talking to mental health professionals. Too many VA psychiatrists, I am told, take a so-called Freudian approach to mental health concerns, focusing on the extent to which problems encountered in adulthood are often the result of a childhood experience.

This mode of psychological thought has not been in the mainstream for quite a while, and I find it hard to believe that it would continue on at the VA. One Vietnam veteran with PTSD was told by the VA that his problems stemmed from "flunking the second grade," and not from the horrors of his war experience in Vietnam. Perhaps more research into the causes and treatment of PTSD within the VA would address this problem and help to update the psychological mode of thinking within the organization.

I first became aware of the PTSD issue through the treatment facility at the Marion VAMC, and the program's director, Dr. Donald Schmidt. The program has been popular with its patients, and has been a quality program. But the capacity of the program has never been more than 12 beds, and thus only the most severe cases have been treated.

Nationally, waiting lists exist for many DVA inpatient PTSD units, with delays as great as 18 to 20 months before admission. This is inadequate for many veterans who have serious PTSD problems now. Since PTSD can be a chronic illness in many cases, time spent waiting will not make a veteran better—over one-half of the men and one-third of the women that ever had PTSD still have it. PTSD is not a problem that will just go away.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONTZ. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from New York for whatever he would like to add.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman for arranging the time to discuss this very important issue, and I want to commend the gentleman for conducting hearings on the issue.

I also want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MCCLOSKEY] who spoke so eloquently with regard to this issue.

This is an important issue. I have had the opportunity very recently, along with my colleague, the gentleman from new York [Mr. FISH] to confer in the Montrose Hospital in Westchester in New York State, Westchester County in New York State, with some of our Vietnam veterans and hospital administrators with regard to this very subject, and with regard to the lack of attention being given nationally to this problem, and it certainly is a stressful problem.

I would like to note for the record a recent comment that I received from one of the presidents of the Vietnam veterans chapter in my area, chapter 333, from Jerry Donnellan, who is one of our leaders in veterans' affairs in my region in New York State in our 22d District. In his recent letter to my office, he states:

This is a condition that although recently realized has plagued combat veterans through all the wars. Simply put, post-traumatic stress is a normal reaction to an abnormal set of circumstances. The reason we feel so strongly about this is that it could be at the root of many other problems plaguing veterans, such as substance abuse, marital problems, unemployment and even suicide. The truly frightening part of PTSD is that the majority of veterans suffering from it are not aware that their condition may be a direct result of their wartime service.

Mr. Donnellan goes on to state:

PTSD like any normal illness, can affect a veteran to greater or lesser degrees. Likewise, the treatment can vary from simply counseling sessions to extended in-patient treatment.

Another fact that may not be generally known is that veterans can be compensated financially for PTSD in the same way that they are compensated for physical wounds received in combat.

One of the problems, of course, is to get PTSD determined to be a disabling problem for a veteran, and for that reason a number of us have joined in cosponsorship of H.R. 794, that is entitled Vietnam Veterans Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder Compensation Act, introduced by our colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER], and I note that our good colleague is one of the cosponsors on that measure. I would hope our other colleagues would join with us in making this a presumptive finding of a disabling condition so that there would not be any question of entitling the veteran to the kind of assistance that is so sorely needed.

I would like to note that from a recent article in the New York Sunday News that was dated May 28, 1989, a timely article around the Memorial Day period, it was an article entitled, "Remember The Vets Who Suffer" by Steven Bentley. It starts off:

Memorial Day is here and you are going to hear a lot of speeches full of nationalistic rhetoric this week, but that rhetoric will serve only to paper over a $600 million shortfall in funding for veterans' health care programs and cover up our Nation's other unmet moral obligations to, in Abraham Lincoln's words, "Care for those who have borne the battle."

□ 1740

Then it goes on to mention how little help here has been with regard to treating post-traumatic stress syndrome, and it states that there are only 12 units in the United States; around 500 beds are earmarked for stress disorder, 500 beds in the entire Nation. Most of them lack funding. Most of them lack trained and experienced staffs. Therapy practices vary widely because of nonexistent clinic guidelines and a lack of coordination. They do not deal effectively with the problems of multiple illnesses like, say, alcoholism and stress disorder that compound each other. There is little or no family involvement or therapy, and some have year-long waiting lists.

Then it goes on to note that, as author Richard A. Gabriel had pointed out, 300,000 out of the 800,000 U.S. ground soldiers who saw combat in World War II were psychiatrically discharged, 300,000 out of 800,000.

A $10 million, 5-year study completed by Research Triangle Institute for Congress concludes that 479,999 Vietnam veterans have full post-traumatic stress disorder, another 350,000 have a partial version of the illness, and included in these figures are more than half the combat veterans. Where do we find the casualties? A study commissioned by the American Legion reports that more than 1 million veterans have significant problems, and that their civilian income is a clear measure of those problems. The average veteran makes $3,000 to $5,000 less per year than his peers in similar education and with many below the poverty level.

In 1986, a special congressional committee chaired by Senator TOM DASCHLE of South Dakota placed the number of homeless Vietnam veterans at 82,000 to 110,000. Two years ago the New England Journal of Medicine published a study that estimates the number of veterans to have committed suicide since returning from Vietnam at 59,000.

Those statistics certainly point to the significance of this problem and how crucial it is.

Again, I want to commend the gentleman from Indiana for bringing this to the attention of the floor and to our colleagues. I hope that our colleagues will join together with all of us concerned about this issue to try to do something substantive about resolving it.

Mr. JONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from New York for participating in this special order. I think the observations he has had to share are right on target. I am sure that what he has found in talking to the VA officials in New York and the veterans in New York is along the lines of what we found in talking to the veterans and the VA in Indiana. I appreciate his leadership on this issue and thank him very much for his comments.

Legislation which I introduced in late July, H.R. 3037, would address this problem and other components of the PTSD issue. I would like to thank the Vietnam Veterans of America and the Wabash Valley Vietnam Veterans in Indiana for their good work in developing the legislation. I would also like to thank the 62 Members, including my colleagues JILL LONG, LANE EVANS, and FRANK MCCLOSKEY, who have cosponsored H.R. 3037.

To finish my statement let me summarize the components of this legislation. The bill would add at least 30 additional inpatient PTSD units to VA medical centers over the next 5 years, which would make a total of roughly one VA inpatient PTSD unit per State. These need to be staffed by full-time PTSD specialists, whether they be psychologists, psychiatrists, family therapists, or other mental health professionals. The need for this expansion is obvious. With waiting lists up to 20 months long for treatment and with veterans traveling hundreds of miles to seek treatment for PTSD at sites like the VA Medical Center at Marion, an expansion of 30 inpatient units is a modest proposal, in my estimation.

I was pleased to see that the DVA has added 23 PCT's, or PTSD clinical teams, to existing VA hospitals through the United States. These teams will help to alleviate the shortfall in PTSD care, but should not be considered long-term solutions to this problem given the VA funding crunch. Centrally funded inpatient units are the way which we should go.

This legislation would also require the DVA to add at least 40 vet centers for readjustment counseling. We heard from many veterans in Indiana who were pleased with the services that vet centers had to offer, and I have visited several myself. I appreciate the good work that the staff of the vet centers do with their limited resources.

I learned from Dr. Arthur Blank, director of the Vet Center Program, that cities as big as Toledo, OH, and Nashville, TN, are without vet centers. These outreach and counseling centers are popular and effective in treating Vietnam veterans with PTSD. Vet center staff members often travel many miles to help veterans with their readjustment problems. I am sure that some of the costs of expanding the Vet Center Program would be offset by savings in travel time and expenses.

The Vet Center Program is celebrating its 10th anniversary this year. I am sure that my colleagues with vet centers in their districts are pleased to have these services available to the Vietnam veterans in their districts. If my colleagues that do not have a vet center in their district had a chance to visit one, I am sure that they would agree that adding more vet centers would be an excellent way to reach out to these hundreds of thousands of veterans that are having readjustment problems but cannot get help.

H.R. 3037 would authorize stable funding for VA contract counseling programs for PTSD, which serve veterans in areas not served by VA facilities. We heard at the hearing that only five individual PTSD cases were contracted out of the Indianapolis VAMC catchment area last year. This is a tool that could be very beneficial in reducing the burden on overcrowded hospitals that are besieged by veterans suffering from PTSD who could otherwise be assisted by private clinics.

In addition to expanding treatment, the bill would encourage the DVA to recruit qualified professionals to administer PTSD care by encouraging the inclusion of psychiatrists, psychologists and others who specialize in the treatment of PTSD in the Health Professionals Scholarship Program. One step that we must take if we are to expand the treatment of PTSD is recruiting qualified professionals to staff these programs.

H.R. 3037 would give permanent, statutory authority to the Advisory Committee on Readjustment of Veterans. Similar to the POW and Women Veterans Advisory Committee, the group would continue to advise and report on activities relating to PTSD. If we want the DVA to focus on the issue of PTSD, then we are going to have to make sure that veterans' groups and PTSD treatment professionals have their voices heard by the Secretary.

The bill would also create a research program for the treatment of PTSD. While a lot of attention has focused on exploring the causes and extent of PTSD, little coordinated study has been done on the treatment of PTSD. This program, conducted within the VA, would study the best treatment methods for PTSD to insure that quality care can be given on a consistent basis throughout the country. We have heard that treatment for PTSD varies widely from place to place. Research on PTSD can help the VA to service those veterans with the disease in a much more effective manner.

Finally, H.R. 3037 would establish a pilot program for PTSD care in halfway houses. This program would be similar to the halfway house program for drug and alcohol abuse treatment, and would take an additional burden off of the already overcrowded VA medical system. This halfway house program comes at the suggestion of a local veterans group in Indiana along with a VA administrator.

We heard from many veterans in Indiana that they have been reliving the war for the last 20 years. It is time that the Congress and the DVA give all veterans suffering from PTSD a welcome home.

Mr. Speaker, this past Wednesday Robson James Mabry, a veteran who earned a Bronze Star for his service to our country in Vietnam, was found dead at the foot of the Tampa Vietnam War Memorial. He took his life.

Mabry had been to the VA twice, as recently as 1987. He was never diagnosed as having posttraumatic stress disorder, but a Tampa area veterans leader believes that Mabry was among the million Vietnam vets who have suffered from PTSD.

Mr. Speaker, the VA's own study shows that only 10 percent of the Vietnam vets currently suffering from PTSD received any help from the VA during the past year. We must do better.

Ms. LONG. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues, and commend Mr. JONTZ, for calling this special order to further highlight the issue of posttraumatic stress disorder.

Before I begin, let me say that I am grateful to the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee, Mr. EVANS, for bringing the subcommittee to my congressional district last month. Mr. EVANS' dedication to the needs of our Nation's veterans is well known in the House of Representatives. As chairman of the subcommittee, he helps to shape the priorities of the full House Veterans' Affairs Committee.

I also thank my distinguished colleague, Mr. MCCLOSKEY, a former member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, for traveling to the hearing to testify. The hearing which was held in Huntington, IN, gave veterans from northeastern Indiana the opportunity to testify on the services and care available to those with posttraumatic stress disorder, a condition commonly referred to as PTSD.

Mr. Speaker, those with PTSD can suffer from nightmares, flashbacks, and a severe withdrawal from society. Many sufferers of PTSD find it difficult to hold a job for any period of time, and many turn away from their families and friends, the very people who most want to help them.

PTSD is most common among veterans of the Vietnam war. Veterans of other wars, however, can also suffer the symptoms associated with the disorder. Like Vietnam veterans with the disorder, they need and should have access to treatment programs and deserved benefits.

Without question, however, it is Vietnam veterans who are most affected by PTSD. As Chairman EVANS has said, a full 15 percent of Vietnam veterans suffer from the disorder. However, only a very small number of these veterans have been helped by the programs provided by the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Congressman JONTZ, an Indiana colleague and member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, has put together a thoughtful piece of legislation. The bill, H.R. 3037, would expand the number of vet centers, and the number of inpatient PTSD units to improve the services provided to veterans with this disorder. I am proud to be a cosponsor of this bill, along with Chairman EVANS, Mr. MCCLOSKEY, and 60 other Members of the House, and I applaud Mr. JONTZ for introducing it.

Our Nation's veterans have earned our respect. They have also earned the right to receive the treatment and care they need. Although it is not a physical injury, PTSD is the direct result of combat experience. The men and women who suffer from it should have access to the best possible treatment.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. JONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

WORLD FOOD DAY 1989: FOOD AND THE ENVIRONMENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, today is World Food Day and the theme for the U.S. Government's observance of World Food Day is an especially important theme. Food and the environment. The natural linkage of the two should be obvious but often mankind acts in a fashion that violates that natural linkage. The result is malnutrition and starvation on one hand and environmental degradation on the other. Each problem complicates the other in a vicious cycle.

Earlier today this Member had the privilege of being the keynote speaker at the U.S. Government observance of World Food Day at the U.S. Department of Agriculture. Honored at the event was Dr. Verghese Kurien of India, 1989 World Food Prize Laureate, for his work on milk for the millions in India. It was introduced by Secretary Clayton Yeutter. It was a diverse audience of schoolchildren, diplomats, leaders of American and international private voluntary organizations, and U.S. Government officials.

This Member also takes special note of two other awards that were bestowed this morning for work on hunger. The Presidential "End Hunger Award" was granted posthumously for his outstanding contribution to our late colleague, Representative Mickey Leland of Texas, my friend and distinguished colleague who chaired the Select Committee on Hunger of the House of Representatives. As all of us know, he and 15 others were tragically killed in a plane crash in Ethiopia in August. This was one of many trips that he and other members of the Select Committee have taken to learn first-hand about the food needs in remote, desperately poor regions of the world. Mickey Leland had a dedication, restlessness, and drive that focused global attention on the devastation of hunger and famine—perhaps more than any other current or past Member of Congress. We on the Select Committee on Hunger feel his death as a great loss and will rededicate ourselves, under the leadership of Representative TONY HALL and Representative BILL EMERSON, to accomplishing the work Mickey Leland was not able to finish on behalf of the hungry of America and the world.

Another award today has, to the satisfaction of this Member, recognized the contributions of the organization, Volunteers in Overseas Cooperative Assistance [VOCA] and the many U.S. citizens who have served through VOCA as international volunteers to build up agriculture and cooperatives in the Third World through the Farmer-to-Farmer Program. This program is one in which this Member takes great pride, satisfaction, and continued interest. It provides a valuable volunteer, people-to-people link to address international food and hunger needs.

As this Member focused his thoughts on the interrelationship between food and the environment, thoughts turn to my home State. When one drives westward across Nebraska on Interstate 80 or, as the pioneers did in their wagon trains on the Oregon Trail—150 years ago—you pass through the rich rolling hills and the eastern stretches of the Great Plains—along the shallow, wide bed of the Platte River. Quite naturally, one thinks about the environment and the rich soils for agriculture production. This is a place where the land and the sky and the people and the weather stay in very close touch with one another. The beginning line of "America the Beautiful" gives you a picture of Nebraska's farm country: "Oh beautiful, for spacious skies, for amber waves of grain."

This is a kind of beauty we want to pass on to our children and grandchildren, as our forefathers did to us. Spacious clean skies. Abundant food. Healthy, well-nourished people. The question is how to maintain those conditions and healthy people. That is what World Food Day is all about—sharing our ideas and visions about how to feed everyone in the whole world while living in harmony with out natural environment.

In our lifetimes conditions are changing worldwide even more dramatically and rapidly than ever. These changes are happening in our environment, in our economies, and in politics. Things are changing so fast that even the scientists, economists, and political leaders don't yet fully understand what is happening. Global weather patterns may be shifting due to the atmospheric pollution. Desertification and water shortages are now constraining livelihoods in many parts of the world, sometimes as a result of intensified agricultural production. The ripple effects of financial and trade policies affect the lives of people in distant countries. People are growing impatient with economic systems that are not productive and with political systems in which they cannot have an effective voice.

It is a real challenge to find the way to pass on a productive world to future generations. As we make progress in correcting earlier mistakes like the improper application of DDT that killed the birds and water pollution that killed the fish, new and unexpected problems appear—holes in the ozone layer, accelerating destruction of tropical forests, and the permanent loss of thousands of species of plants and animals.

Even more sadly, people are still dying and environments are being degraded for reasons that could readily be prevented. It is a real failure of policy and failure of imagination and collective intellect when we know to correct or avoid a problem and yet we do not organize ourselves so that others take advantage of that knowledge. The fact that there are 750 million hungry people in a world which can produce enough food to feed them is a terrible and unacceptable failure. Unfortunately, the policy process and the political process within and between nations responds slowly. It seems that we must have a crisis before anything constructive happens.

There are some major changes that must take place in our own thinking if we want to make these changes work for good instead of against us. Most importantly, we must know the right questions, and trust ourselves to find new ways to answer these questions, working together as a nation and as part of a world community.

Today, World Food Day, is a good time for us to share with each other what we think are the right questions to ask for the world today. I would challenge every American—young person or adult, public servant or private citizen—to go home and write down their own list of important questions to be answered. The survival of this Earth as a good home for us requires the best ideas from each of us if we are going to live together in peace and prosperity.

Here are this Member's suggestions for just three questions to ask that will help us to develop the right answers to the challenges of world hunger and a healthy environment.

First, how important is it for everyone on Earth to have access to the basics of a productive life? I think it is very important.

It is a sad fact, documented by the World Health Organization, that 20 percent of the world's population, or 1 billion people, are too malnourished or sick to be economically or socially productive. Think of the wasted productive capacity when that proportion of the world's population is doomed by malnutrition or disease to be dependent on others instead of self-supporting. UNICEF estimates that at least 35,000 people die every single day for reasons that can easily be prevented. Most of them are children under 5 years old dying from a combination of malnutrition, diarrhea, and vaccine-preventable diseases. That is a preventable tragedy which kills more people every day than the Armenian earthquake. Imagine if the morning newspaper headlines read "Crash of 75 jumbo jets, full of children; no survivors." That is the magnitude of this preventable disaster this very day—every day, all year long—every year.

Experts now agree that these deaths can be eliminated by the year 2000 with an integrated approach to basic nutrition and health, involving the four dimensions of adequate food, primary health care, basic education, and safe water and sanitary waste disposal. Plans are already in existence for such a program. The cost is modest. UNICEF's report on "State of the World's Children 1989" estimates that well-directed expenditures of less than $20 per person per year, most of which is already budgeted by national governments, international organizations, private voluntary organizations, or other sources, can provide the basis of food, health care, education, and water supply and sanitation for all.

Permanent programs that eliminate the root causes of hunger and disease will have to be based on public-private partnerships among governments, international organizations like the Food and Agriculture Organization [FAO], the World Health Organization [WHO], UNICEF, and the World Bank, together with grassroots groups in the developed and developing world. The fundamental question is whether we have the will to end these preventable deaths.

My second question is: Do we want to be on friendly terms with nature or not? The answer should be obvious for all who wish to survive and to have our children and grandchildren survive in a hospitable environment. Ecological thinking has too often been thought of as "antiprogress" when, in fact, it is essential for progress. There has been a tendency to look at nature as a source to exploit. Now, gradually, people are waking up to the fact that we are all part of the same system. If we ignore nature or treat it as a slave, sooner or later it seems to retaliate.

Nature's well-being is important for our well-being and vice versa. This is particularly true of the links between hungry poor people and the environment. As the report issued by the World Commission on Environment and Development stated to the world community in 1987:

> Poverty is a major cause and effect of environmental problems. It is therefore futile to attempt to deal with environmental problems without a broader perspective that encompasses the factors underlying world poverty and international inequality.

The Commission called for a major new commitment to Third World development, using economic practices attuned to environmental needs.

Science is our best ally in working hand-in-hand with nature to enhance the goods and services that our natural environment can provide. And agriculture, since prehistoric times has been the premier arena for friendly cooperation between man and nature. The first agriculturalists, gathering seeds from swamps and wild meadows to plant in their cultivated fields, were the true forerunners of the rice research scientists at the International Rice Research Institute today. By working with nature and with each other, we can continue to feed everyone. But the ability to do so depends on approaching nature with respect and learning to sustain its health and productivity.

My third question is whether people are ready to work together to do what it takes to organize a world without hunger.

It is a tragic fact that most starvation in the world today is caused by man—not by the limits of nature or lack of agricultural ingenuity. It is often the result of civil wars in which the food supply for civilians becomes a pawn in a political struggle. The right of noncombatants to food during situations of conflict is explicitly protected in the Geneva Conventions. Article 25(1) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights also states that "everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and his family, including food * * *". To starve people into submission and refuse to allow relief supplies to go to them should be as abhorrent to all of us as slavery is. If all nations and all people promised never again to use food as a political weapon, we would have made a major improvement in the humanity of the human race.

On a more positive note, there are numerous areas for useful international collaboration between people and between nations in food supply and distribution for hungry people. The World Food Program, the International Fund for Agricultural Development [IFAD], and FAO itself provide good examples of what can be achieved through international programs to use food-for-work and other forms of assistance to improve sustainable food production, incomes, and nutrition of the poorest people in the developing world, most of whom live in rural areas.

In Congress we have strongly supported our bilateral Public Law 480 Food for Peace Program since its inception in 1954. The United States Government's Food for Peace Program has now provided over $40 billion in grants and concessional sales of food to countries and people without enough food.

However, we must recognize that there are other areas of peril and opportunity for cooperation that lie ahead. The outcome of the GATT negotiations on agricultural subsidies could have a major effect on whether international markets for food continue to be subject to major distortions based on subsidies and trade barriers. Debt reduction negotiations will affect the resources available to the poorest countries for food imports and for improving their domestic agricultural productivity. The U.S. Food for Peace Program will need to be reauthorized and perhaps reshaped in the 1990 farm bill.

Also, there are some new needs and some new ideas that need to be explored in the immediate future. A combination of trends—an unusually low level of international food reserves, rising grain prices, and budgetary constraints on the amount of food aid funding from traditional donors, including the United States—makes the food situation for many of the poorer nations and people in the world especially precarious in the next few years. Yet this is the same moment when special action in rural areas of the poorest countries would have the highest payoff in eliminating hunger while restoring and enhancing the natural environment. Some of the investment needed could and should come in the form of food payments for work on rural infrastructure projects like land terracing, water management, tree replanting, and road maintenance, as well as income-generating projects.

In the Congress this Member has been promoting several bills and resolutions that identify new possibilities for collaboration. Some of this legislation has already been enacted. One idea is to make more use of debt-donations and debt-swaps for development activities. Private voluntary groups and UNICEF have already begun to trade donated debt paper back to governments in exchange for domestic currencies for investments in environmental conservation, water supply, and other development activities. Bringing down an unmanageable level of debt while putting more funds into the voluntary sector and development work is good all around.

Another idea is to encourage countries with financial surpluses, such as Japan, to work with countries with high agricultural production capabilities, like the United States, to build in a higher level of security in world food supplies for the poorest of the poor through arrangements for special food purchases under long-term contracts for specific relief and development purposes. The World Food Council and other international stocks will be needed in the next decade for interventions to insure adequate levels of basic nutrition for the very poor in the world. Such financing arrangements could be an important part of any new arrangement. With the hunger, poverty, and environment links becoming clearer to everyone, and with a 1990 decision on a new farm bill, we could design our food production targets and the administration of our food aid program to make the most difference in the global conquest of hunger.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would like to quote a 12-year-old friend of mine, Miss Hope Temple, on what the real question is regarding the problems of hunger and the environment. When asked how we can solve these problems, she put it simply. "How are we going to do all this? We in America have food and we have vaccinations, but other people are dying every day because they don't. We are hurting nature and that is not good for us or for nature. If everybody would be willing to help, then it could be different. It's as easy as that." She went on to ask: "Would you be willing to help these people? Would you be willing to recycle? Would you be willing to give up a dollar or two? Would you be willing to work together? This Member asks every American child and adult, "Would you be willing to do your part to help the poorest one-fifth of the human race become productive, to protect our natural environment, and to work together in new ways to help each other?" The answer must be a resounding "yes." It is increasingly clear that the future of the planet and mankind is in our collective hands. Hunger, a hospitable environment, peace, and prosperity for all of us, and future generations, are inextricably linked together.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

A CLIMATE OF TERROR AGAIN GRIPS GUATEMALA

HON. GEO. W. CROCKET, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, kidnapings, death threats, bombings, and murders on a scale unseen since civilian President Vinicio Cerezo took office in 1986 have shaken Guatemala and raised fears of a renewed terror campaign of the sort that seized this Central American country a decade ago.

Thus begins a recent Washington Post report on the unfortunate country of Guatemala. The human rights situation steadily deteriorated last year and this year following two attempted military coups. Apparently, one of the concessions made to the coup plotters was to permit human rights violators in the military to operate with greater impunity. The result has been an increase in killings, torture, kidnapings, and disappearances that has taken Guatemala back to the days before the advent of civilian government.

This phenomenon is both a cause and a reflection of a decline in President Cerezo's authority vis-a-vis the military. This predicament is not surprising. From the beginning, the United States has been at best a lukewarm supporter of President Cerezo. We have refused to recognize his powerlessness and the abuses that have been perpetrated by a military that he cannot control. Every coup attempt, and every increase in repression, has been rewarded by increases in unconditional military aid to the very forces that conduct or condone the repression. By refusing to recognize the problem, we have been unable to address it. We have failed to insist—and to support President Cerezo in insisting—that the military hand over power and cease its abuses as a condition of our aid. Now our benign neglect of the threat to democracy and human rights in Guatemala is coming back to haunt us—and Guatemala's democrats.

It is late—but not yet too late—to give Guatemalan democracy some real backing. The United States Embassy in Guatemala should stop denying and condoning these abuses. And the administration should withhold fiscal year 1990 military aid until the human rights situation turns around.

The Washington Post article follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 29, 1989]

"CLIMATE OF TERROR" AGAIN GRIPS GUATEMALA—KILLERS, BOMBERS SAID TO TARGET CIVIL RULE

(By Lee Hockstader)

GUATEMALA CITY.—Kidnappings, death threats, bombings and murders on a scale unseen since civilian President Venicio Cerezo took office in 1986 have shaken Guatemala and raised fears of a renewed terror campaign of the sort that seized this Central American country a decade ago.

Although many government officials and diplomats blame rightwing extremists for much of the violence, it is a measure of the instability here that no one can say for sure that other sectors, including drug traffickers, government security forces and leftist guerrillas, have not been responsible for some of it.

Diplomats and politicians say that if the violence continues on the way to elections late next year, it could pave the way for the return of an authoritarian, repressive government of the type that Cerezo's Christian Democratic Party replaced nearly four years ago.

"Things have deteriorated rapidly," Factor Mendez, director of the independent Center for Investigation, Study and Promotion of Human Rights in Guatemala, said in an interview, "It's not just one group or sector that's responsible, but several with a common interest—to create problems of instability for the government."

Human rights activists trace a steady increase of violence since a failed coup attempt by disgruntled right-wing military officers in May. In the last six weeks, 11 students from San Carlos University have been kidnapped in the capital. The bodies of five have been found bearing signs of torture. The other six are still missing.

Ramiro Castillo Love, a banker from one of the nation's wealthiest families, was murdered at his home Aug. 25, just weeks after the assassination of Danilo Barillas, a prominent member of Cerezo's Christian Democratic Party and a former ambassador to Spain.

In the first half of September, according to the Guatemala-based newsletter Central America Report, 27 deaths across the country were attributed to political violence, most of them in the rural provinces of San Marcos, Chimaltenango and Quetzaltenango, where a small but durable leftist guerrilla insurgency has increased operations in recent months.

Bomb and grenade attacks in this capital have knocked out electricity and caused property damage to stores, offices and a hotel in an elegant section of town.

At the same time, death threats to student, labor, and community and political figures appear to have increased sharply. This week, the White Hand, a right-wing terrorist group that had been relatively inactive in recent years, circulated a death list with dozens of prominent names.

The threats have unnerved political activists who had taken advantage of the civilian government under Cerezo to organize and assume a more vocal role in national politics.

"I can't deny that I'm scared," said Ramiro Menchu, a board member of a large labor federation. "All of us in the union movement are scared. Many have left. We don't know who at any moment will be the next victim. That's how delicate the situation is right now."

It has become almost a regular feature of local newspapers to recount the flights into exile in Spain, Mexico or Australia of individuals and families frightened by threats or violence.

At San Carlos, the nation's largest university, student organizations traditionally thought to sympathize with the guerrillas have been hit hard. Of 16 student directors of the Association of University Students, only five are still active. Six have quit because of threats, two have fled the country and three have been kidnapped.

"There's a climate of terror here," said a 24-year-old San Carlos law student, who asked not to be named. "Students who used to hang around and get a bite to eat after class now go straight home."

"There has always been a certain level of threats and intimidation," said Rosalina Tuyuc, head of a group of widows whose husbands were killed in political violence. "Now the threats are being fulfilled."

Earlier this month, the escalating violence led the State Department to issue a travel advisory warning Americans about the danger of travel in Guatemala. U.S. Embassy Charge d'Affaires Philip Taylor has also issued statements condemning the violence as the work of "enemies of democracy" who "prefer terror and violence to debate and dialogue."

There is no shortage of explanations for the motives of the violence, although many analysts agree it is neither from a single source nor centrally directed.

In an interview, Defense Minister Gen. Hector Gramajo blamed right-wing former army officers and businessmen who failed to overthrow the government in coup attempts this year and last, as well as the "extreme left" and drug traffickers at San Carlos University.

Almost no one suggests Cerezo's government is directly sponsoring the violence, as military governments did a decade ago when an official counter-insurgency campaign killed thousands of guerrillas, Indians, politicans and civic activists.

Nor has the level of violence to date approached that of the late 1970s and early 1980s. However, a number of groups charge that government security forces and army intelligence officials, if not directly involved, are guilty of complicity for not taking steps to stop the terror.

"The government knows who it is, or could know, and they're doing nothing to stop it," said Nineth de Garcia, head of the Mutual Support Group, which aids families of victims of political violence.

Gen. Gramajo rejected the idea that the government is permitting the violence, blaming instead the judicial system, which he said is inept. "We depend on the judicial system. To ask the military to solve the problem is unfair."

Garcia and others also blame Cerezo for not trying to reverse a last-minute move by his predecessor granting amnesty to all members of the military involved in the counter-insurgency campaign. "They never prosecuted anyone from the previous government," she said, "so the people who killed then are ready to kill again. They're unpunished."

Some observers say the right wing has lost patience with the more open political climate under Cerezo, including strikes this summer by teachers and postal workers that shut down schools and stopped mail delivery.

Whatever the cause of the violence, many analysis agree that the effect is to undermine Cerezo's government, which took over in 1986 after 16 years of often brutal rule by military regimes. The violence, they say, fosters a sense of insecurity and mistrust as well as a conviction that civilian democracy cannot work here.

"If the situation continues as it is or gets worse, the people who will lose are Cerezo's Christian Democratic Party," said one European diplomat. "The change will favor the man who promises to restore order."

That man may be Efrain Rios Montt, a retired general who seized power in a 1982 coup and held power for about a year and a half.

Although Rios Montt's government was marked by massacres of Mayan Indians in the Guatemalan highlands, he is remembered by many of his countrymen as a strongman who restored order and got common crime off the streets.

Rios Montt's bid could be blocked by a constitutional prohibition against candidates who took part in coup attempts. Rios Montt, arguing that the 1985 constitution cannot be applied to him retroactively, is seeking a ruling from the Constitutional Court.

DISABLED PEOPLE WANT TO WORK

HON. STEVE BARTLETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, this article written by Wendy Carol Roth, and SSDI recipient, accurately outlines the barriers of current law and describes how the H.R. 8 compromise, included in H.R. 3299 as part of the budget reconciliation, will make it possible for SSDI recipients to return to the work force. One hundred and ninty four Members of the House have cosponsored H.R. 8, the Social Security Work Incentives Act, and support this compromise. Its compromise provisions must be retained the final budget reconciliation package so that disabled people like Wendy Roth will have the opportunity to return to work.

LET US WORK!

(By Wendy Carol Roth)

I never expected to receive Social Security benefits at the young age of 36, but I do. And I never thought that, by accepting help from the government, I'd entered a situation where trying to return to work could cost me money. Yet, unless some antiquated laws are changed in Congress. I and the millions like me have little financial incentive to return to work. On the contrary, we face severe economic penalties if we again become employed.

We want to work, but the law discourages us.

It could one day do the same to you: People with disabilities from the only minority group that anyone can join at any time. Those between ages 35 and 60 are four times more likely to become disabled than to die.

I never had any intention of joining the ranks of the unemployed—subsidized or otherwise. Yet, for the past two years, I have received Social Security Disability Insurance (SSDI). For 15 years, I worked as a television producer for NBC's Today, ABC News, PBS and for seven years with Phil Donahue. Plus, I hold two degrees—a B.A. from Princeton and an M.A. from Stanford. Unfortunately, I also suffer from a severe case of multiple sclerosis, which generally has weakened me and deprived me of any walking abilities. I now rely on an electric wheelchair to get around.

Still, I always expected to work.

With television studios and other meeting places often beyond my wheelchair's reach. I devoted more energy to my writing career. Meanwhile, I applied for SSDI, to which I felt entitled. As a taxpayer, I had contributed to the system and, after all, a situation like mine is one reason why such government programs exist. Financial assistance is often necessary as one learns to manage disabilities and finds jobs suited to new limitations.

After much effort, I made $75 writing one month, $135 the next. Two months later, I sold a third article for $350. Modest earnings by anyone's standards. But I was quickly disqualifying myself from receiving further SSDI support. In government parlance, I soon would be considered "gainfully employed" and back on my feet, so to speak. I only wish it were that easy to be cured!

Individuals like me on SSDI risk losing our benefits after we've earned more than $75 a month nine times. (In January 1990, it will be raised to $200.) These nine "trial work months" need not be consecutive. Trial work months are how the government lets SSDI recipients test if they can manage returning to work, even with our impairments. But after this trial period is exhausted, our cash benefits, which are determined by a worker's average lifetime earnings, can be terminated whenever we earn more than $300 a month. (In January, it becomes $500). Our medical benefits, which we receive through Medicare after two years on disability, also eventually will be canceled. These are especially precious and the reason why many are on SSDI, since private insurers usually will not provide a disabled person with adequate health insurance. Even the new $500 earnings limit is not much of a work incentive. The average months SSDI benefit for disabled persons is $530, which one can receive without ever trying to work. And try paying for medical expenses, housing and food with $500 a month!

I am not alone in this dilemma: 2.8 million disabled American workers receive SSDI benefits. Only one of every 200 of them ever rejoins the labor force. The price for self-sufficiency is often too high. An additional 3 million disabled Americans receive federal assistance through Supplemental Security Income (SSI). These people have less than $2000 in liquid assets.

Like me, nearly one million of those receiving SSDI are under the age of 45—at the prime of our work lives.

How the law can change. The Social Security Work Incentive Act of 1989, sponsored by Reps. Steve Bartlett (R., Tex.) and Robert Matsui (D., Calif.) and Sens. Robert Dole (R., Kan.) and Donald Riegle Jr. (D., Mich.), would make it possible for persons with disabilities to ease themselves back into the work force. The proposals include a new "Medicare buy-in" program, allowing disabled workers to contribute on a sliding scale to their health insurance until they are fully responsible for their Medicare premiums. If work becomes impossible again, full SSDI cash benefits could resume.

The proposed revisions also would allow those who qualify as "disabled adult children" to work while taking advantage of a graduated cash-benefits program. The revision originally was intended for all SSDI recipients, but the bill's sponsors later limited it to this small group, hoping to get at least some reforms passed this session.

In 1986, similar reforms allowing the disabled to work were made permanent in the SSI program. Last year, more than 35,000 SSI recipients were back in the work force earning a salary—and thus paying taxes and saving the government millions of dollars.

What does the Social Security Administration say about changing the law? "We wholeheartedly agree with the principle of the reforms, but working out the details within our budget is going to take some work," said Deputy Commissioner Lou Enoff. The agency's concern, according to Enoff, is that many moderately disabled people now functioning in the work force without SSDI support might be eligible to join if the law becomes too liberalized.

I asked Representative Bartlett about the potential rise in costs to the government if the law were changed. Bartlett responded: "The Social Security Administration's estimates are grossly inflated. The accountants are unable to see that, whenever more people are working, the country and the taxpayers benefit." Bartlett suggested that even if 10,000 of those receiving SSDI returned to work, the government would save $70 million per year in cash benefits alone, not to mention the additional taxes collected from these new workers.

As the bill approaches a vote this fall, I continue to write for magazines and develop television projects, and I have a book contract. Like many people with disabilities, I want to work. I feel that my soul, apart from my pocketbook, depends on it. Though it might jeopardize my disability benefits (even writing this article does that), I am committed to devoting my heart, mind and education to the "gainful activity" this society and I deserve.

Our country cannot afford to have its disabled citizens forever unemployed. Do not penalize us. Just let us work!

What you can do. Ask your Representatives and Senators to vote "yes" on the Social Security Work Incentive Act of 1989 (HR 8 and S1358). Also, urge your Congressmen to work for expanding the provisions to benefit everyone with disabilities who wants to work.

TRIBUTE TO JUSTICE EDWIN F. BEACH

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Justice Edwin F. Beach, who has been selected as this year's recipient of the prestigious Ben E. Nordman Public Service Award. The award, named after a renowned Ventura County attorney and community activist, is given annually to a member of the legal profession who has made outstanding contributions to the community.

Justice Beach began his law practice in Santa Paula, CA, in 1950. At that time there was no public defender, and one of Justice Beach's noteworthy cases was the defense of an accused murderer who could not afford counsel.

A judge for more than 20 years, he has sat on the Santa Paula Justice Court, Ventura County Municipal and Superior Courts and the State Court of Appeals in Los Angeles, from which he retired in 1986. Justice Beach still donates time to sit on the bench in local courts and serves as visiting judge in other counties on special assignment. Before assuming the bench, Justice Beach was president of the Ventura County Bar Association.

Over the years, Justice Beach, the father of seven children, has been a Boy Scout leader and served on the boards of directors of Children's Home Society, Campfire Girls, the Santa Paula Elementary School District and the Ventura County Symphony. He helped found the Blanchard Community Library Endowment and the Santa Paula Theater Center. He raised thousands of dollars and devoted countless hours of time not only to these groups but also to boys and girls club, 4-H and hospice projects.

I ask my colleagues to join me in recognizing Justice Edwin F. Beach for his exemplary record of professional and civic achievements. Ed Beach is truly a model community leader, one who every community would love to have. My wife, Norma, and I wish our good friends, Ed and Janet, the very best.

TRIBUTE TO THE YOUNGSTOWN PRIDE

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the Youngstown Pride who, in front of more than 7,000 fans, came from behind and defeated the Calgary 88's 118 to 116, with a thrilling rally in the final 2 minutes of the game to capture the World Basketball League championship.

Although the professional basketball franchise in Youngstown is only 2 years old, the Youngstown Pride has developed a reputation as a team who peaks at the right time, playing extremely well during the final month of the season. This year, Pride won 11 of the final 12 games, including a WBL record of 8 consecutive games, to increase themselves suddenly to second place in the final WBL standings. In the history of Youngstown sports, no basketball team has ever won a world championship. The Youngstown Pride is the first team to capture the league crown and this has covered plenty of excitement and self-esteem in the Mahoning Valley.

The 1989 season has been described as an "incredible season" for the Youngstown Pride and its fans. The team has drawn over 101,000 fans and averages over 3,400 fans per game despite owning the smallest market in the World Basketball League. The Four on the Floor tournament involved the top four teams in the league in a best of three format, which included Calgary 88, Illinois Express, Las Vegas, and, of course, Youngstown Pride. In the first round, Youngstown defeated the Illinois Express twice to advance to the championship round. Calgary needed all three games to dispose Las Vegas, which they did. This brought the two teams, Youngstown and Calgary, together for the final round of the Four on the Floor. The final contest between these two teams has been compared to the type of victory that people talk about again and again and the kind of win movie directors like to recreate.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Youngstown Pride for their impressive and exciting victory of the World Basketball League championship. Teamwork and motivation worked as the Pride scored the last seven points of the game including two clutch free throws to bring home Youngstown's first ever professional team championship. I am honored to represent these tremendous athletes and outstanding individuals.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE 60TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SAN PEDRO KIWANIS CLUB

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is with a strong sense of pride and great enthusiasm that I rise today to salute the San Pedro Kiwanis Club. On Friday, October 20, 1989, the San Pedro Kiwanis Club will celebrate its 60th anniversary. This occasion gives me the opportunity to express my deepest appreciation for the many years of service this organization has provided to San Pedro and the surrounding community. As a nearly 50-year Kiwanian, I'm only a few years behind.

The San Pedro Kiwanis Club was formed by a group of 31 professionals and businessmen on July 28, 1929, some 14 years after the first Kiwanis Club began in Detroit. This 60-year-old organization has made significant contributions to the community through its sponsorship of youth groups and many other community organizations. Among these groups are the Key Clubs of San Pedro, Mary Star of the Sea, Miraleste High Schools and the Kiwanette group at San Pedro High. All these youth groups raise money for charity and do community service projects, such as the Fishermen's Fiesta, Street Faire, and pancake breakfasts.

The San Pedro Kiwanis Club also supports the San Pedro YMCA, Door Key Project at the San Pedro YWCA, the Salvation Army, the Harbor Foundation for the Retarded, San Pedro Boy's Club, Meals on Wheels, Heifer Project, Interfaith Shelter, Toberman Settlement House, California Parks Ministry, Harbor View House, Boy Scout Troop No. 1075 for the trainable mentally retarded, as well as the Toys for Tots program. As you can tell from this rather lengthy list, my district has benefited greatly from this organization's efforts.

The hard work and determination of the officers and members of the San Pedro Kiwanis Club have not just been limited to San Pedro. Several San Pedro Club presidents have gone on to become district and regional officers. Edgar Jensen, Ted Springfield, Clyde Lheureux and Bud Olds served as lieutenant governors, for California, Nevada, Hawaii Division 19, in 1941, 1950, 1951, and 1980, respectively. But Olds was recently elected as 1990-91 governor-elect at the August 1989-90 district convention in Anaheim for the California, Nevada, Hawaii District.

My wife, Lee, joins me in extending our congratulations to this wonderful asset to the San Pedro community. We look forward to providing assistance to the San Pedro Kiwanis Club and its incoming president, Dr. Walter "Willie" Wolleat. Hail Kiwanis, International .

CENSUS ISN'T FOR ILLEGAL ALIENS

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, this week House and Senate conferees will begin negotiations on the Commerce, State, Justice appropriations bill that will determine whether illegal aliens are to be counted in the 1990 census for the purpose of reapportioning the House. This Member commends to these conferees and my other colleagues the following particularly insightful editorial that appeared in the October 6, 1989, edition of the Omaha World-Herald. The editorialist argues that illegal aliens have no constitutional right to congressional representation.

Furthermore, the editorial merits close examination for its clear statement that in counting illegal aliens for purposes of the census we are penalizing those immigrants who are playing by the rules in entering the United States legally. This essay brings into sharper focus the issues surrounding this controversy.

CENSUS ISN'T FOR ILLEGAL ALIENS

The House of Representatives has voted to support the Census Bureau's plans to include illegal aliens in the 1990 census count of population in the states. Opposition to that idea has arisen in the Senate, with good reason.

Getting an accurate count is next to impossible. For obvious reasons, people who are in this country in violation of its immigration laws prefer to minimize their contacts with representatives of the government. An undercount seems likely.

One of the main reasons the Founding Fathers provided for a census was to determine how many representatives each state would have in the House of Representatives. Illegal aliens have no constitutional right to congressional representation.

The move to represent illegal aliens in the census reflects the desire of certain states and municipalities to receive larger federal aid packages that are population-based. Populations in fast-growing places—such as Arizona, Florida, Texas and California—determines the size of the congressional representation for such states. More representation for fast-growing states comes at the expense of states that are not growing as fast and that do not have large populations of illegal aliens.

Some people believe that a partial count of illegal aliens in 1980 added one congressional seat to the California delegation in the House and one to New York state. This was unfair to other states, which became underrepresented as a result. If the same policy is followed more thoroughly in 1990, Pennsylvania, to give one example, could lose one of its seats because of bloated counts in other states.

The pressure of illegal immigration may have been relieved by the amnesty that Congress provided several years ago. But it is still a serious problem. Including illegal immigrants in the census would be another step toward legitimizing their status, in effect putting them ahead of would-be immigrants who followed the rules. Such a policy would almost certainly be self defeating in the long run.

THE MATHER SCHOOL: CELEBRATING 350 YEARS OF PUBLIC EDUCATION

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 350th anniversary of the Mather School, America's first elementary school and the oldest continuously operating school in the Nation.

This year on October 20 the Mather School celebrates an accomplishment that stands as a tribute to the educational values that are a cornerstone of our society. In May 1639 the people of Dorchester, MA, decided to establish a school that was "to teach English, Latin, and other tongues, and also writing." It was named after prominent Dorchester minister Richard Mather, father of Increase Mather and grandfather of Cotton Mather.

The Mather School began as a one-room structure with six students and one teacher. The community levied a tax on its citizens to pay for the school's operation. This marked the first time that a school in North America was supported by a direct tax levied upon the citizens of the community. The Mather School was established on the premise that it be a "free" school, open to all children regardless of their economic status. Following its opening, the people elected three wardens to oversee the operation of the school, thus establishing America's first school board.

The rigorous academic year and strict discipline of the school's early years seem overwhelming by today's standards. Students attended school 12 months a year, 6 days a week, without vacation. Discipline "with the rod" was the norm and there was a heavy emphasis on religion in the curriculum, with the Bible serving as the sole textbook.

Since then the school was adapted according to the changing structure of American society. In 1784, girls were admitted for the first time. The present building on Meeting House Hill, erected in 1904–05, reflects the value that turn-of-the-century Bostonians placed on public education. The architectural complexity of the schoolhouse, and the quality of the school's interior made the Mather School a "jewel in the crown of the city's nationally acclaimed public school system." Today, the school reflects the changing structure of urban America. The school serves 550 students who are overwhelmingly minority and disadvantage.

After a period of readjustment following school desegregation in the 1970's, the Mather has begun to establish an identity as an inner-city school with a proud tradition and a new mission. The Mather's celebration of its 350th year is an appropriate time for the Nation to celebrate a long and proud history of taxpayer-supported public schooling. The Mather School is a symbol of something that has made this Nation great.

Mr. Speaker, I want to expecially acknowledge the contributions of Kim Marshall, principal of the Mather School, and the entire faculty and staff for their fine work. I want to commend the Mather School for its long tradition of service to the Dorchester community, and for promoting the ideals of hard work and the importance of a quality education.

CPL. JUNIUS RUCKER, DALLAS POLICE OFFICER OF THE MONTH

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, our local law enforcement agencies and their dedicated employees are our first line of defense against crime. It is always a great pleasure for me, as a member of the House Committee on the Judiciary and its Criminal Justice Subcommittee, as well as a Dallas resident, to join in paying tribute to some of our best local law enforcement officers.

Dallas Police Cpl. Junius Rucker has been recognized as October Officer of the Month, and I take pride in calling his achievements, described in the Dallas Police News, to the attention of my colleagues and fellow citizens.

The article follows:

OFFICER OF THE MONTH—CORPORAL RUCKER RECEIVES OCTOBER AWARD

Southeast Cpl. Junius Rucker, a 10-year veteran, has been selected as the October Officer of the Month by the Dallas Area Police Awards Committee. He will be honored during an Oct. 11 luncheon hosted by the Oak Cliff Lions Club.

Assigned to the first watch, Cpl. Rucker has been a field training officer since 1984. His supervisor, Sgt. Larry Barbee, said, "It is in the role of a field trainer that Cpl. Rucker excels. He has been commended several times by his trainees for his contagious enthusiasm and sincere interest in their performance."

In addition to his role as a FTO, Cpl. Rucker displays strong leadership among his fellow officers. He volunteers to assist other officers, particularly younger officers, on major calls. The officers within his sector solicit his advice on both professional and personal matters.

"The accomplishments of officers such as Cpl. Rucker are often overlooked," Sgt. Barbee said. "He goes about his business in a quiet, efficient manner. However, his contribution to our department cannot be overlooked or understated."

Cpl. Rucker has spent his entire career at the Southeast Division. During that time, he has received 19 commendations including 12 for the apprehension of felony suspects.

He and his wife, Denise, have five children and three grandchildren.

ONE HUNDRED AND NINETY FOUR MEMBERS SUPPORT H.R. 8, THE SOCIAL SECURITY WORK INCENTIVE ACT

HON. STEVE BARTLETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, 194 Members of this House have cosponsored H.R. 8, the Social Security Work Incentive Act. The House has included a compromise to H.R. 8 in H.R. 3299, the budget reconciliation package which removes barriers to work for Social Security Disability Insurance [SSDI] recipients. The Senate Finance Committee's budget reconciliation package has similar provisions.

This compromise removes an essential disincentive to work by allowing SSDI recipients to return to work without the risk of losing their health care benefits. A similar work incentive was enacted in 1986 for supplemental security income [SSI] recipients which has resulted in an increase of 20,000 SSI recipients who now have earnings.

These provisions must not be stripped from the final budget reconciliation package. Without these provisions, current law will prevail which is a catch-22 for disabled persons. Under current law a disabled person who is unemployed has health insurance, the same disabled person with a job does not.

Today, only one-half of 1 percent of disabled people on SSDI return to work because of the barriers in current law. By giving SSDI recipients the opportunity to buy into the Medicare system, as the compromise does, a major work disincentive is eliminated. The average SSDI benefit is $550 per month or approximately $7,000 per year. If 1,000 SSDI recipients return to work the Government will save $7 million in annual benefits; if 10,000 return to work, $70 million will be saved, and if 100,000 return to work, $700 million will be saved. In addition, these workers will become taxpayers and contribute to the economy.

Regardless of the outcome of the other items in reconciliation, H.R. 8 must be retained and signed into law. Disabled people will return to work and improve their lives. American productivity will increase with a larger labor force, and the taxpayers will benefit with lower costs.

I urge the cosponsors of H.R. 8, many of whom will be conferees on the budget reconciliation package, to retain these provisions that promote employment opportunities for disabled people.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, due to scheduling conflicts, I was unable to cast votes on October 12. Had I been present, I would have voted in favor of House Resolution 262, providing for consideration of H.R. 2978, the Flag Protection Act. However, I would have voted against passage of the bill on grounds of the question of the constitutionality of the bill.

I also would have voted "yes" on H.R. 1495, the Arms Control Authorization Act of 1989, and "no" on H.R. 2748, the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1990.

TRIBUTE TO S. SGT. T. WILLIAMS AND SRA. R. NINER

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to give special recognition to two Air Force law enforcement officers who were instrumental in the recent arrest of two men in the possession of drugs.

S. Sgt. Timothy Williams and SrA. Richard Niner, members of the 4392d Security Police Squadron, Vandenberg Air Force Base, intercepted a speeding vehicle on Highway 1, near the base, on September 16. They became suspicious of the two occupants of the vehicle because of their inability to produce identification. A backup unit from the local Sheriff's Department was called to the scene, and after a thorough search of the vehicle, $1,500 worth of crack-cocaine was discovered. Both men have been incarcerated in the Lompoc Jail.

Unfortunately, even beautiful Santa Barbara County is not exempt from drug problems. I am very encouraged that the Air Force and the Sheriff's Department continue to closely work together to keep northern Santa Barbara County drug and crime free. Our war on crime and drugs is exactly that—a battle against these evils. I agree that since we have declared this war, our military, too, must be involved, though in a careful and selective way. This bust on Highway 1 is an excellent example of civilian-military cooperation.

All too often defense budgets and issues are seen in terms of exotic weapons—like stealth bombers and carrier battle groups. Actions like this recent arrest by S. Sgt. Williams and SrA. Niner remind us that our Armed Forces are certainly more than tanks and jets. Our military actually provides a broad range of defense. Indeed, a good example of this spectrum of defense can be found right at Vandenberg Air Force Base. The base is critical for strategic deterrence with its ICBM testing programs and is helpful in local community defense by helping to keep our neighborhoods safe through local police actions like the one I have highlighted today.

The greatest asset of the Armed Forces continues to be its people: America's soldiers, sailors, and airmen. S. Sgt. Williams and SrA. Niner have done a great service to our County and deserve a special thanks and recognition. Keep up the good work!

TRIBUTE TO DISTRICT ATHLETES

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to high school athletes of my 17th Congressional District who have displayed noteworthy accomplishments on the gridiron and golf course.

Shawn Patton, a Campbell Memorial running back, rushed the ball for 202 yards on 25 carries to aid in a Red Devil victory over Wooster. Shawn scored on a 56-yard touchdown run and threw an 11-yard pass for another score in the 28 to 8 defeat of Wooster. Shawn has already amassed 1,005 yards this season and has helped lead Campbell Memorial to seven victories.

In that game, coach and assistant principal Ed Rozum was forced to coach due to his administrative status while Campbell schools were on strike. The teachers, however, expressed their support for the team by displaying a sign that conveyed their blessing.

Quarterback John Ryan connected on 12 of 19 passes for 155 yards as the Boardman Spartans defeated Lakewood St. Edwards. John completed two of those passes for touchdowns and tallied another on the ground in the 35 to 0 victory. John, a junior, is filling the position once held by NFL great Bernie Kosar of the Cleveland Browns.

Boardman High School is also home of the girls' fourth annual Ohio golf coaches State championship tournament. During the tournament held on Ohio State's Gray Course, Boardman players posted the following scores: Kelly Cap, 90; Sue Brenner, 94; Michelle Kolb, 99; Tracy Kelecave, 99; and Keri Ferguson 106.

Zack Sahli of North Jackson Milton scored four touchdowns in a 42 to 20 victory over Lowellville. In that game, Zack carried the ball 18 times for 135 yards.

Quarterback Mark Brungard of Springfield Local threw two touchdown passes against South Range. Mark completed 18 of 36 passes for 252 yards.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Shawn, Ed, John, Kelly, Sue, Michelle, Tracy, Keri, Zack, and Mark for their accomplishments and service to their communities. We praise them for their dedication and the contributions they have made to our area. I am honored to represent these outstanding individuals.

"REVIVING 'LITTLE TOWN' RADIO"

HON. JON L. KYL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, I include an article entitled "Reviving 'Little Town' Radio," which appeared in the August 9, 1989, edition of the Washington Post to be reprinted in the Record.

[From the Washington Post, Aug. 9, 1989]

REVIVING "LITTLE TOWN" RADIO

GLOBE, AR.—When Willard Shoecraft first hit the airwaves 50 years ago, radio was most people's major source of news and entertainment.

"Radio was a great and wonderful thing," says Shoecraft, who is back at the helm of a station he founded, massaging listeners daily with his gentle yet authoritative and mellifluous voice, a throwback to an era when radio was king.

At 68, Shoecraft is an engaging entrepreneur, raconteur, on-air pro and civic-minded world traveler.

He's also an example for others, though he insists on minimizing that.

When Shoecraft started June 1, 1939, just out of Phoenix Union High School, changing records at KGLU in Safford, he worked 70 hours a week, including the 6 a.m. sign-on to 12:15 a.m. sign-off on alternating Sundays as record master of ceremonies, "whatever that is." The pay was $10 a week.

In those days the dial was less cluttered. There were six stations on the air in Arizona, compared with more than 180 today.

"It was the prime entertainment in those days, and it probably was fed a lot by the Depression," Shoecraft says. "If you could get enough to buy a radio, this was your family entertainment, and it was free."

Standard fare included Bob Hope, Bing Crosby and the Kraft Music Hall, the Firestone Hour, Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

"The best entertainment in the whole world. . . . To my way of thinking, it's still just as magnetic if it's done right. Of course, the competition now is fierce."

"Shoecraft, self-taught, has met that competition with his own brand of "little-town radio" a comfortable mix of talk, information, music and general help, plus a large dose of local news. "If it's news in Globe, we've got it."

The philosophy is simple: Interact with listeners.

Here's the formula:

A morning "Open Line" call-in show;

"The Money Tree," offering $20 or more to callers who correctly answer five true-false questions, like whether President Truman sold his memoir rights in 1953 to the Saturday Evening Post (he didn't; they went to Life magazine);

"Trading Post," a daily swap shop;

Requests for work, clothing or other help for local needy citizens.

Then there are Larry King, California Angels' baseball and other sports.

"He's been so involved in the community through the radio station," says Sheldon Miller, manager of the Chamber of Commerce. "He caters to just so many people."

Frank B. Healy, a close friend since childhood, says Shoecraft's "word is as good as his signature." But "he's a poor poker player."

It's often difficult to get a straight answer from Shoecraft, Healy says. "I think I'm the only one who can outjoke him at times."

Shoecraft has lived in Globe since 1943. In 1958, he went on the air with his own station, KIKO-AM, originally broadcasting from the lobby of the Copper Hills Hotel. Eventually, he stuck a deal with Inspiration Copper Co. to build a mobile-home park, and moved KIKO into one. He built stations in Safford and Winslow and sold them, then in 1979 established KIKO-FM, with the highest FM signal possible, carrying 80 miles into Phoenix.

Over the years, he's made the most of turning bad luck into good fortune.

For instance, there was the time a hunter shot a telephone line, jumbling signals so a conversation between two women was broadcast over KIKO, Shoecraft faced a threat of being sued until he became friends with one of the women's sister, Billie, whom he married.

Shoecraft played piano in a bar, served on the city council and as vice mayor, and once ran for the state senate. "I was soundly beaten," he says.

He served on the hospital and industrial development boards and was active in scouting. He and Billie, who died in 1976, raised three sons: an account-developer and noted balloonist, an attorney and a school administrator.

He subsequently married Billie's nurse, Ruth.

Now, Shoecraft is running KIKO a second time. He sold the stations in 1987 for $1.75 million and bought back the AM station in June 1988 for $125,000.

He provided "a vehicle for people to vent their feelings, sometimes in anger, sometimes in excitement, sometimes in joy, but whatever, the people have had an opportunity to be part of that radio station," Miller says.

One other thing sets Willard Shoecraft a bit apart: Since an accident when he was 8, he has had no legs.

It's one the few things he doesn't talk much about.

WELFARE REFORM

HON. BOB LIVINGSTON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, from time to time, we fine-tune our welfare system. But we haven't brought about any meaningful solutions in an awfully long time. Sooner or later, we must attack the root causes of poverty instead of encouraging its proliferation.

We all know that problems exist, but perhaps we fail to truly visualize how bad they are. In case you haven't thought about them in awhile, the letter below describes the frustration flowing in the wake of our inaction.

ROBERT L. (BOB) LIVINGSTON,
Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. LIVINGSTON: My name is Val Zimmer, I am a Junior at the University of New Orleans. I receive no grants or Federal funds to go to school. I work in the off months and part-time during school; I pay for school myself. Also, my overall G.P.A. is a 3.50 which is very good.

I am not crying to you because of this situation; I will do anything to better myself and my future. However, I am really concerned about the future of the city and State that I was born and raised in: New Orleans, LA. Most of my classmates and I will have to move to another State to find a good job and fewer hassles.

Much has to be done to turn this city and State around. I hope you will take my opinions very seriously because my opinions are shared by a very large number of people that I have spoken to, including students, blue-collar and white-collar workers, teachers, blacks, whites, and many others.

One of the biggest problems of this State is the policies of the welfare system. Granted, we do need welfare, but it needs to be overhauled. Why should these people be allowed to sit home, do nothing and get a check every week? Most of these people receive welfare, food stamps, free housing, Medicaid and other benefits and they are always crying for more. These people have been getting a free ride since the day they were born, and they will continue to rape the Government unless something is done. More stringent requirements for social programs should be installed. Also, strict penalties for people who are caught that take advantages of the welfare system. And people who do qualify for benefits should be required to do some form of work. They could paint their housing project, clean the streets, any form of work and responsibility. The chain of dependence on the Government must be broken.

Another problem of this same welfare class is their illegitimate birth-rate. If the parent can't support herself, how can she support her new-born child? The answer is that she can't and this is the problem. The child will be raised in a hostile environment, probably by one parent, and he will depend on the Government for his survival. This is not fair for the welfare mother, the welfare child, and not fair to the rest of the country that is paying for this. Welfare women should be given birth-control devices bonuses and special privileges if they do not have children. And they should be allowed to have only one child. You may say "What about her rights". Well, what about my rights. I made a total of $7,000 last year; this figure is well below the poverty line. If I want to get married, I can't because I can't afford it. I do want to have kids, but I can't because I can't afford it. The welfare families get more Government money for every child they have; so why shouldn't they have children. This must be stopped.

Finally, the drug problem that has engulfed this country is caused by illegitimate birth-rate, welfare, and free housing. These illegitimate children are born because their mothers are on welfare. The children grow up in the already overcrowded and hostile environment of housing projects. Very few of these children will get the experience or the education needed to make money legitimately. And therefore, for them, the best way to make money is to get involved with drugs.

This problem is a very serious problem and it needs to be addressed immediately. The welfare system was not designed to handle this large number of people. The working class is getting smaller and the welfare class is getting larger. What happens when New Orleans, LA has a larger welfare class than a working class? For the sake of the State and everyone living here, would you please pass the legislation that is needed to reform this welfare system. You would help the working class but more importantly, you would help the welfare class. The drug problem would begin to decline, the overcrowded housing wouldn't be so overcrowded, and these people can start to support themselves. Please hurry, time is running out!

Sincerely Yours,

VAL J. ZIMMER.

ELENA ESPINOSA, THOMAS CHANG, AND MARIANO SOSA—WINNERS IN THE ESSAY CONTEST: "WHAT IT MEANS FOR ME TO BE IN AMERICA"

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute today to three constituents of mine who have been selected winners in an unusual but very significant essay contest. The three were selected as first place winner and two runners-up in an essay competition among students of adult education classes in citizenship or English-as-a-second language [ESL]. The topic of their work was "What It Means for Me To Be in America." The competition was sponsored by Lodge No. 1112 of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks in San Mateo, CA. I commend the Elks for their public spirited effort in sponsoring this competition.

First place winner was Elena Espinoza of San Mateo, CA. Runners-up were Thomas Chang also of San Mateo and Mariano Sosa of Burlingame. I would also like to pay tribute to the dedicated teachers who inspired and encouraged these students in their studies—Marcia Cohn, Angela Brandi, and Theresa Bruno.

The winners were recognized at a special luncheon held recently at the College of San Mateo as part of a day-long series of events marking the bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution and the bicentennial of the U.S. Congress. The events gave special focus to the Library of Congress, and Librarian of Congress, Dr. James Billington, was the key participant in those events.

Mr. Speaker, I commend these outstanding adult education students for their excellent essays and for their effort in studying English and American citizenship. Their work reflects a strong commitment to informed participation in our free and democratic society. This informed citizen involvement is essential to the proper functioning and the preservation of our democratic government and way of life.

Mr. Speaker, I insert these three excellent essays in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

WHAT IT MEANS FOR ME TO BE IN AMERICA

(By Elena Espinoza)

I have lived in the United States for over twenty years. The reason why I came was because America offers a variety of opportunities. I feel lucky to be in America. I have been given the opportunity to work and progress in life. In Peru, where I am from, I could have never accomplished as much as I did here. For example, my brother is a doctor in Peru. He doesn't make as much as a doctor would here. He could never afford to come to visit me. I don't have the education and schooling as my brother but with the opportunities that America provides I am able to save enough to see him and my family.

America is a good, beautiful country. It offers people from all over the world a good education and job. That is why people come because America is a small world of all cultures and opportunities. I also like America because it has fair laws which are equal for all. This is something that my country is missing. For example, I like how the government protects the children until they are 18 years old and the senior citizens. This is very important to me. In my country, the government overlooks the elderly and the children that need help. Some turn to the streets and have to beg for money to eat.

In eight months, I will be taking my test for citizenship. I have learned all about the constitution and the first ten amendments. The Bill of Rights protects many of the rights of the people and has been helping the people for almost 200 years. I am so excited to finally become an American citizen. My children were born here so for me it will be an honor. Some day I will be able to vote and perhaps have a seat on a jury. America has offered me so much that it make me very happy.

WHAT IT MEANS FOR ME TO BE IN AMERICA

(By Thomas Chang)

America is a great democracy. Thanks to the Constitution I enjoy freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom from want, freedom from fear. America has an infinitely valuable treasure in this Constitution which divides the government into three branches to prevent a dictatorship. During more than 200 years of tradition America has made progress, and people come from all over the world adding their cultures.

America's land is beautiful, having many natural resources. I must appreciate the good things that were passed on to us by those who came before. I must be a good citizen.

In 1929 I was born in Korea, which was occupied by the Japanese. I was brought up in a state of extreme poverty under a dictator. The government controlled the economy with food, suppressed speaking and writing, and changed family names to Japanese. When a holiday occurred only the sun flag flew. In 1937 the Japanese fought China. Two years later World War II began, and the government started to ration food. We were facing famine conditions. But on August 15, 1945, the Japanese unconditionally surrendered.

On June 25, 1950 North Korea invaded the South starting the Korean War. I was under communist rule about three months. They were gentle in appearance but cruel at heart. They made all decisions; people had no human rights. The war ended in 1953, and from that time on my family and I desired to immigrate to the U.S. In 1972 we got permission.

I suffered for a long time. Thank God, here in America I have liberty, peace, justice, and equality. Freedom is very important in my life. I must repay America's kindness. I have to learn English to communicate with many people and relatives, to have the right to pledge allegiance to the flag and to be a good citizen. I'll do volunteer social work to repay my country for its Constitutional guarantees.

WHAT IT MEANS FOR ME TO BE IN AMERICA

(By Mariano Sosa)

My name is Mariano Sosa. I came to this country in 1981 from my country (Guatemala). I like the U.S.A. because I can study, work, and live in peace. The last time somebody asked me, what is the United States for me? I answered that the United States is the world.

It is the world because there are many cultures, languages, races, colors (of people). My family lives in Guatemala. I don't want to go back to live there because I like to live here. I love the law, because it is not necessary to have blue eyes, brown hair, and to be tall to live in this country and to have responsibilities and rights like the natives in the U.S.A.

There are many reasons to live, to live this country. Now I am studying to have a better future. I want to be an able person in the society of the United States. I think that when I learn to speak the official language, I'll go to the college or university to follow my career. Because I am in accounting, I want to be an accountant.

ARAFAT STATEMENT IS REGRESSIVE DIPLOMACY

HON. GERRY SIKORSKI

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, the United Nations reconvened this month and atop its agenda is a resolution by the Arab States to expel Israel. So what's new? This happens every year and why should this year be any different? I'll tell you why. Because the PLO has supposedly moderated its stand.

Since the PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat's historic statement in Geneva last December, the definitions of terrorism and PLO have undergone some very enterprising interpretations depending on the incident and the audience. Arafat has found it necessary to shroud words and deeds in order to please both his constituency and the United States.

An environment has been created, as tenuous as it may be, which has fostered a flurry of diplomacy. We have seen Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's 4 points and election plan. We have seen Egypt's President Mubarak's "10 point plan." And now, we have seen Secretary of State James Baker introduce his 5 points. All have attempted to bring the main players in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict closer together and make conditions ripe for peace.

But for conditions to be ripe there must be peaceful intentions, diplomatic compromise, clarity and unambivalence. Only then can integrity, confidence and trust sit at the negotiating table.

So, if the Arab States are unwilling to make a sign of conciliation at the United Nations and withhold their Israel expulsion resolution and if the PLO hasn't brought its charter in line with its statement of December, then on what basis does Israel have reason to reduce its suspicions and negotiate in good faith?

Yasser Arafat was in Japan just lask week. In Japan—a nation whose unfair trade practices with Israel was the subject of a letter sent by over 100 Members of Congress to the then Japanese Prime Minister Sosuke Uno—Arafat made the following very unequivocal threat:

Recently trade relations between Japan and Israel have expanded. Have you forgotten the 200 million Arabs and the friends of the 200 million Arabs in the world? Do you know how much of the oil the world imports comes from the Arab world? It is not necessary for you to think of our interests. Think of your own interests. Coincidentally, Japan upgraded the PLO office in Tokyo to a mision in appreciation for the PLO's declaration to renounce terrorism and recognize the right of Israel to exist.

The United States should not dawdle on this extortion of a major world government. The 1989 foreign aid authorization bill states that U.S. policy is "opposed to restrictive trade practices or boycotts imposed by foreign countries against countries friendly to the United States." Japan, has been a leading offender of this policy and now that it has made recent progress with companies like Mitsubishi opening trade with Israel, the PLO is turning up the heat. The United States must firm up Japan's resolve to stand tall against the PLO shake down.

After 40 years of unabashed terrorism and a declared desire to destroy the State of Israel, statements such as this in Japan and the statement in August at the Palestinian National Convention does not instill confidence in the sincerity of negotiating partners. Let Arafat employ his "power of speech" on his Arab allies to make peace and refrain from embarking on the expulsion resolution path in the United Nations instead of using it to strongarm Japan. What is needed here are confidence building measures, to be taken by all parties involved, to show that a leopard can indeed moderate its spots.

UNIVERSITY CLUB DIAMOND JUBILEE

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 70th anniversary of the Santa Barbara University Club. The first organizational meeting of the University Club was held March 29, 1919, and on June 20, 1919, Mr. Ralph W. Hersey was elected the club's first president.

On July 16, 1919, the club began serving meals. The rate schedule was: breakfast 35 cents, lunch 50 cents, and dinner 75 cents.

On June 29, 1925 Santa Barbara experienced an earthquake with a magnitude of 6.2 that devastated the town, particularly the central business district. The University Club withstood this temblor magnificently. Some repairs were necessary, but none extremely severe, the advantage of good solid frame construction when building in "earthquake country."

The strength of the club and its members was tested during the difficult times of the depression—resignations continually outnumbered new memberships and there were a large number of delinquent accounts during those hard times. It was a difficult time for the club, but it survived, due to the diligent and careful supervision of a cautious and conservative board of directors.

World War II was another challenge to the University Club as many members were called away to various branches of the military service. To ease the pressure of the times, dues were waived for members for the period of their service. After the war ended many members returned to Santa Barbara and the club was back in full swing.

The 1950's and the 1980's both could be called the decade of expansion for the University Club. During the 1950's the club physically expanded with one extensive renovation as well as acquisition of more property.

In 1983 the club's by-laws were changed to include the female gender anywhere the masculine was referred to. At this time a special processing method was worked out so that the members of the Santa Barbara Associates, an organization serving the needs of professional women, were admitted to club membership. Today Molly Dahm serves as the first female manager since the founding of the club in 1919.

I congratulate the University Club of Santa Barbara on the occasion of its 70th anniversary and I wish the members well in the years to follow. May you celebrate another 70.

TRIBUTE TO THE OHIO FRATERNAL CONGRESS

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the Ohio Fraternal Congress which for 72 years has helped financially support various inspirational organizations in our country and my community.

The Ohio Fraternal Congress originated in 1917 with Franklin Rubrecht presiding as its first president for 20 years. From 1937 to the present, a new president has been elected every year to serve the congress. Peter Maravich is now the 53d person to act as president of this respected, collective body. This year, Mr. Maravich has decided to bring the congress to the Youngstown area to celebrate its 72d annual congressional banquet.

The Ohio Fraternal Congress represents approximately 500,000 members. The members consist of various ethnic backgrounds. Of the 102 fraternals in the United States and Canada, 63 belong to the Ohio Fraternal Congress. This group has aided financially many organizations who attempt to reach out and serve those in need. In our area alone, the congress has supported such dedicated groups as the Hattie Larlham Foundation, Inc., Community Guidance of Greater Cleveland Area, the Holy Family Cancer Home, and the Deaf and Blind Apostolate of St. Augustine Church. Each of these programs provide the guidance and motivation for those who need help or who feel desperate or lonely.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Ohio Fraternal Congress for its impeccable service to its country and community. The reason for the congress' success stems from its understanding and compassion for other people's problems. We are deeply indebted to these members for their dedication and the contributions they have made to our area's causes. I am honored to represent these outstanding individuals.

CONVENTION II

HON. MIKE SYNAR

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. SYNAR. Mr. Speaker, for the past 14 years a group of young people have gathered in the Nation's capital, under the auspices of Convention II, to debate the merits of several proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States. This exercise in democracy offer the participants an opportunity to review and vote on crucial constitutional issues facing our Nation today.

Convention II's 1989 meeting ran from February 7 until February 11 and was composed of 92 student delegates from grades 9 to 12. They were aided by 18 advisers which were made up of teachers and administrators, and 23 college students who acted as staff members. Other participants included 106 Members of Congress who were in the Convention II founders committee which provided advice and assistance to the program. Ten prominent business people and educators comprise the Convention II, Inc. Board of Directors. Fifteen educators and former advisers serve as the National Advisory Council.

Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully request that the following findings of the 1989 conference be inserted in the RECORD:

CR 102—Relative to the Right of Privacy (Defeated 30 for, 58 against).

CR 412—Relative to the Prohibition of the Possession of Hand Guns by Civilians (Defeated 17-57).

CR 509—Relative to the Basic Human Need for Shelter (21-45).

CR 302—Relative to the Electoral College (Defeated 34-52).

CR 206—Relative to the Presidential Item-Veto (Defeated 55-30).

CR 403—Relative to Capital Punishment (Defeated 34-48).

CR 103—Relative to Giving D.C. full Voting Representation in Congress (Defeated 38-50).

CR 503—Relative to the Official Language of the U.S. (Defeated 37-48).

CR 107—Relative to the Right of an Individual to have an Abortion (Defeated 42-45).

CR 109—Relative to Minority Rights (Defeated 47-39).

CR 202—Relative to the War Powers of the Congress and the President (Passed 60-29).

CR 402—Relative to the Terms of Supreme Court Justices (Defeated 24-64).

CR 310—Relative to Naturalized Citizens (Defeated 58-30).

CR 512—Relative to a Balanced Budget (Defeated 20-66).

CR 108—Relative to Euthanasia (Defeated 38-45).

CR 308—Relative to the repealing of the 22nd Amendment Defeated 25-57).

Although four resolutions obtained a majority vote the Rules of the Convention II require a two-thirds vote of the Convention for passage of a resolution. Only one resolution received this thus indicating the resistence of the delegates to modify the Constitution. Perhaps this represents a national sense of satisfaction with the Constitution. Or maybe these delegates were unable to reach sufficient compromises on the ultimate question concerning these constitutional changes.

The only resolution to be approved by the Convention, CR 202, specifically mandated that neither the Congress nor the President could send draftees into an armed conflict until a formal Declaration of War has been passed.

The Delegates to Convention II wish to extend their appreciation to the Members of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives, who enabled them to deliberate in several historic and inspirational chambers on Capital Hill.

The Official Journal of Convention II 1989 will soon be available. For a copy of the Journal, and for further information regarding Convention II, please contact Richard Werner at Convention II National Headquarters, P.O. Box 1987, Washington D.C. 20013-1987, (202) 544-1789.

Respectfully submitted,

THOMAS ROONEY,
Convention Secretary.

Mr. Speaker, I would invite all my colleagues to join me in commending the Convention II Conference Board and participants for their fine work in encouraging thoughtful consideration of important constitutional issues before the American people today.

A MEADOW OF HONOR FOR VETERANS OF WAR

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I submit for the RECORD a copy of an article that appears in this week's issue of Insight on the News entitled, "A 'Meadow of Honor' for Veterans of War?" This brief article talks about my bill, H.R. 88, which would set aside an appropriate area in Arlington National Cemetery for the burial of uncasketed, cremated remains. A spot has already been chosen, and plans are ready to implement this legislation. The area will be a pleasant greensward not suitable for casketed remains. It will include a small wall similar to a mini-Vietnam memorial.

H.R. 88 has already passed the House and hearings have been held in the Senate. My good friend and colleague, BOB GRAHAM, is the principal Senate sponsor, with Veterans' Affairs Chairman ALAN CRANSTON and ranking minority member FRANK MURKOWSKI as original cosponsors.

This type of burial is purely optional. It will serve to extend the life of Arlington National Cemetery, which the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs says will run out of casket space by 2020 and urn space by 2029. I acknowledge that, in the beginning, use of this will probably be light. However, as William Phipps, professor of philosophy, Davis and Elkins College, Elkins, WV, said in his statement in favor of my bill:

A generation from now, when grave space is exhausted at the Arlington National Cemetery, it is actually likely that the majority of body disposals in the United States will then be by cremation, even as it is now in some states and in some cities * * *. If it is attractive enough, there may well be many people who would prefer the greensward rather than an internment plot. This would thereby extend the options for others at the cemetery beyond 2020, the anticipated date for the exhaustion of available burial plots.

I thank all those who have seen the logic in this legislation and have joined me as cosponsors. At date of House passage, 79 other Members of the House had joined me in this needed legislation, including such stalwarts as full committee chairman SONNY MONTGOMERY and subcommittee chairman HARLEY STAGGERS.

Those testifying on behalf of the bill in the House included representatives from the Paralyzed Veterans of America, the Non Commissioned Officers Association, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars. The Bush administration strongly endorses the bill, and the director of the cemetery is a proponent, having already put together the needed planning.

So, Mr. Speaker, I submit the above-mentioned article and look forward to seeing this needed legislation sent on to the President. It is forward looking, meaningful, and appropriate legislation.

A "MEADOW OF HONOR" FOR VETERANS OF WAR?

(By Eric Felten)

As the veterans of World War II grow older, Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia is running out of space. Rep. Charles E. Bennett hopes that veterans can continue to be buried at Arlington and has introduced a bill that would make an area of the cemetery that would otherwise not be used into a meadow where ashes are spread beneath the sod.

The Florida Democrat, whose son was buried in such a greensward in Falls Church, VA, wrote to the assistant secretary of the army for civil works to suggest the interment option, saying that "there are many people in modern life who would prefer pushing up grass, daisies and trees to having a stone marker." The only marking would be a metal or stone plaque listing the names of all buried in the meadow.

Rick Graham, a spokesman for Bennett, stresses that burial in the greensward would be voluntary and says the bill should pass easily. Arlington National is expected to run out of casket space by 2020, urn space by 2029.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO LARRY DEVAN WILLIAMS

HON. CLAUDE HARRIS

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding member of the teaching profession, Larry Devan Williams. Mr. Williams has been selected as a recipient of a Presidential Award for Excellence in Science and Mathematics Teaching. This program, administered by the National Science Foundation on the President's behalf, recognizes those men and women who exemplify the highest standard of teaching quality.

Mr. Williams has been a mathematics and computer education teacher at Eutaw High School in Green County, AL, since 1984. His dynamic and interactive teaching style has put the gift of mathematics more easily within the reach of many of his students. He has encouraged greater student involvement in the disciplines of mathematics and computer education by organizing and serving as an adviser to the Mu Alpha Theta Mathematics Club, the Alpha Chi Sigma Computer Club, and the Eutaw High mathematics teams in algebra I, algebra II, geometry, trigonometry, precalculus, and computer education. With his guidance, Eutaw High School teams have attended many regional computer and mathematics tournaments. I am sure that his students would give him an "A+" in both teaching and inspirational skills.

Although the Presidential Award is probably the most prestigious recognition to date, the success of Mr. Williams' innovative teaching style has long been appreciated by both State and local educational authorities and the parents of his students. We, in the seventh district of Alabama know that education is an investment in our future. That future is made more promising by the generous talents of such fine teachers as Mr. Williams.

Congratulations to Larry Devan Williams for a job well-done. Long may he share the invaluable gift of learning with us.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO SYLVIA L. ULMER, RETIRING CITY CLERK OF PATERSON, NJ

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest admiration and pride that I rise today to salute a truly outstanding public servant whose tireless dedication to her profession, her church and her community have truly made the City of Paterson, NJ, a better place to live.

I am speaking of Mrs. Sylvia Ulmer, the Paterson city clerk, who is retiring after 17 truly productive years in that position, and 37 years of devoted service to the city of Paterson overall. In recognition of her many invaluable contributions and her numerous outstanding achievements, Mrs. Ulmer will be honored with a dinner-dance on Thursday, October 19, 1989, at The Tides in Haledon, NJ.

Mr. Speaker, I know that, along with being a great source of pride to Mrs. Ulmer, this event will also bring great honor to her family; her loving husband, Joseph Ulmer, Sr., and her children, Patricia and Bryan. And I also know that this event's success will be the direct result of the vigorous efforts of the retirement dinner committee and its hard working chairperson, Jane E. Williams.

Mr. Speaker, Sylvia Ulmer, a graduate of Eastside High School in Paterson, began her career with the city of Paterson in 1952 after successfully passing a civil service clerical test. She attended Sherwood Business Evening School and, with great effort and dedication, worked her way to the top of the civil service clerical ladder. This dedication led to Mrs. Ulmer being named acting city clerk in 1967, and to her appointment to the prestigious position of municipal clerk in 1972.

With this landmark appointment, Mrs. Ulmer became the first Black municipal clerk in the State of New Jersey. During this time she also completed courses at the Rutgers University extension division, which resulted in her being cerified as a registered municipal clerk by Rutgers and the State of New Jersey. Sylvia Ulmer attained tenure in 1977. During her long and oustanding career with the city of Paterson, Mrs. Ulmer has served under seven Mayors, two presidents of the board of aldermen and eleven city council presidents.

Mr. Speaker, along with her professional accomplishments, Mrs. Ulmer has also been highly active in her community. She served as a member of the board of Passaic County Vocational-Technical High School from 1979–1987, serving as president of the board in 1986–1987. She also served as president of the Association of Vocational and Technical Schools of New Jersey.

Among her many activities and memberships, Sylvia Ulmer served as president, vice president, and secretary of the Municipal Clerks Association of Passaic County. She is also a member of the Municipal Clerks Association of New Jersey and the International Clerks Association, and she has served as a member of New Jersey Black Elected and Appointed Officials, the NAACP, the National Council of Negro Women, the YWCA board of directors and the Paterson Girls Club.

Mr. Speaker, Sylvia Ulmer has also been an active member of the Canaan Baptist, Church, where she belongs to the emergency choir, and where she organized and directs a parent support group ministry. Mrs. Ulmer also is a member of the East 34th Street Block Association, and the Coordinating Council of Citizens Alliance for a Drug Free Paterson.

As a result of her numerous efforts on behalf of her profession, church, and community, Sylvia Ulmer has received numerous awards. During Black History Month in 1984, she was given a special award for being the first black city clerk of the State of New Jersey. She was also honored by the Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, the Sam Hughes Scholarship Fund, the Falls City Post of the American Legion and the Beauticians Association. She was also honored as Mother of the Year in 1983 and received the Christian Service Award from the Canaan Baptist Church and the Calvary Baptist Church that same year.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to present a brief portrait of an outstanding and truly invaluable public servant whose dedicated efforts on behalf of her profession, community, and church have made her city, State, and our Nation a better place to live—Mrs. Sylvia Ulmer, retiring city clerk of Paterson, NJ.

TRIBUTE TO COUNCIL 46 P.N.A.

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Council 46 of the Polish National Alliance which is celebrating its 75th anniversary this year. The council was founded on April 19, 1914, at the Free Polish Krakusy Hall at 903 Franklin Avenue in Youngstown, OH. When the council was formed, there were only 300 members. Today the council is comprised of 8 lodges, four in Youngstown, OH, two in Campbell, OH, one in Warren OH, and one in Newton Falls, OH. These eight lodges now have a combined membership of 1,238 people.

Council 46 is part of the Polish National Alliance which is the largest fraternal organization of Americans of Polish descent in North America. Since 1915, Council 46 has taken part in all of the quadrennial conventions of the alliance.

Council 46 P.N.A. has been deeply involved with the youth in its area. For many years the organization supported a youth group which presently is composed of 35 children. The council has held various membership drives in the community to get people more involved in the organization and to become more aware of the Polish National Alliance's charitable and educational causes.

Council 46 is very proud of three of its members who have attained very admirable positions in the Polish National Alliance. These noteworthy individuals include Mr. Joseph Habuda, former vice censor of the P.N.A., Mrs. Irene Wallace, former lady commissioner of District IX, director and vice president of the P.N.A., and Mrs. Mary Grabowski who served two terms as the lady commissioner of District IX, P.N.A.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Council 46 of the Polish National Alliance on its 75th anniversary. The council's success stems from its understanding and compassion for other people's problems. We are deeply indebted to the members of Council 46 for their dedication and the contributions they have made to our area's causes. I am honored to represent these outstanding individuals.

THE PORNOGRAPHY VICTIMS PROTECTION ACT OF 1989

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Pornography Victims Protection Act of 1989. This bill is the improved successor of H.R. 1213, which garnered strong bipartisan support from 118 of our colleagues in the 100th Congress and was considered at a hearing held by the Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime.

We can no longer stand by and say that pornography is a "victimless crime." A Federal Commission has documented that abuses of coercion, intimidation, and fraudulent inducement into posing and performing are rampant in the pornography industry which is controlled by organized crime. The victims often are people who were sexually abused as children and/or are financially distressed. This, to me, is the major outrage of pornography; and it is time to empower the victims by providing them with legal recourse for the harm that has been done to them. The legislation I propose today is unique contrasted to all other pornography legislation because it confronts the pornography problem and provides the opportunity for justice without infringing on our first amendment rights.

The Pornography Victims Protection Act of 1989 would allow victims of pornography, both child and adult, who are coerced, intimidated or fraudulently induced into posing or performing in pornography to institute Federal civil actions against the producers. If they prevail, such victims would receive treble their actual damages and cost of bringing suit. Furthermore, the bill authorizes the Attorney General to seek $100,000 in civil penalties from any person violating Federal child or adult pornography statutes. If the Government prevails, it is authorized to distribute the penalty money among all of the identified victims in the case.

In addition to providing monetary and injunctive relief to victims, direct civil actions will facilitate enforcement of related criminal statutes. Like a direct action for victims, a government action for civil penalties will be subject to a lower burden of proof than in a criminal prosecution, and this should facilitate action against pornographers. Unlike direct actions, victims would not be required to come forward publicly. This is an especially valuable benefit in child pornography cases, since many child victims are unwilling or unable to endure the severe traumas of courtroom testimony.

To deal with concerns raised by the booksellers and publishers, the legislation has been rewritten to focus exclusively on targeting and penalizing producers. All criminal provisions embodied in the bill apply only to the producers and not the transporters or distributors. This bill provides a sound and constitutional mechanism for deterring sexual exploitation and compensating victims.

Due to its dubious legal status and organized crime involvement, pornography is primarily an underground industry with little or no accountability toward its work conditions or product. Obscenity law only addresses the offense to society's sensibilities and ignores the victimization that is part and parcel of the pornography industry. Without conflicting with our first amendment rights, the Pornography Victims Protection Act would provide civil remedies to the forgotten victims whose hurts are unaddressed by current obscenity laws.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Pornography Victims Protection Act of 1989 will effectively combat a great degree of sexual exploitation in the United States and should like to take this opportunity to encourage my colleagues to cosponsor.

ALLIED HEALTH PROFESSIONS PROMOTION ACT OF 1989

HON. TERRY L. BRUCE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Allied Health Professions Promotion Act of 1989.

Today the health care field is reaching a crisis. In a recent survey by the American Hospital Association of more than 3,000 hospitals, one-fourth of those surveyed said they have cut services. More than 15 percent have closed beds or units and approximately 13 percent had sent patients to other hospitals because their staff was lacking.

In the rehabilitation fields the vacancy rates for available personnel have risen up to as much as 20 percent in some regions, while in others, almost every slot is empty. For those who want to become physical or occupational therapists, they have the pick of almost any area of the country or any place to work, because there are seven jobs for every one physical or occupational therapist.

In the next 31 years, the number of Americans over the age of 65 will increase from 21.1 million to 54.5 million. The demand for all health care workers will increase by 42 percent by the year 2000, because of the increased average age. The demand for physical therapists will increase by 87 percent. In contrast to this, the entire labor force is expected to increase by only 19 percent.

While the demand will continue to climb for health care professionals, the supply will not. The American Medical Association reports that the number of graduates of professional programs and the quality of these graduates has been declining steadily.

The baby boom days have ended and the labor pool is decreasing. Today the majority of health care workers are women, but the opportunities for women in other fields have increased dramatically during the past 20 years. The health care field is also suffering from a poor image, low salaries, and long hours.

The bill that I am introducing today will help many involved in the allied health field. An allied health professional can be almost anyone involved in health care—be it a nurse, a clinical technician, a physical therapist, or an occupational therapist.

Funding increases will be authorized through this legislation for those allied health programs most in need, particularly in fields relating to the care and rehabilitation of the elderly and disabled. Recruitment, improved teaching programs, and traineeships will help recruit talented individuals into the rehabilitation field.

In addition, a division of allied health professions and advisory council will be established within the Health Resources and Services Administration's Bureau of Health Professions, and a pilot program in allied health research would be developed to design and fund a program of grants for allied health research projects.

My distinguished colleagues, I am very concerned with the state of our health care system in this country. I believe that with legislation such as this we will come closer to finding a solution to the crisis that affects us. I hope that this bill will help improve the quality of care and number of health care professionals in the rehabilitation field. As our country's population begins to age and our medicine becomes more sophisticated, the need for physical therapists, occupational therapists, and many more health care professionals increases. Congress must not wait for this crisis to grow before acting.

CELEBRATING THE CUBAN PEOPLE'S SPIRIT OF FREEDOM

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mrs. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, the Cuban people struggled for almost a century to win their independence. A tyrannical government—responsive to an ideology foreign to that of our continent—has temporarily curtailed the freedom that was conquered with so much sacrifice.

Last week, on October 10, one more anniversary of the beginning of the longest of the various wars for independence fought by the Cubans was commemorated.

On this new anniversary it is my strong wish, Mr. Speaker, to pay homage and admiration to the spirit of the Cuban people for liberty and freedom.

WALNUT CREEK CELEBRATES 75 YEARS

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to invite my colleagues to join me in celebrating the 75th anniversary of the incorporation of the city of Walnut Creek, CA.

Known simply as the Corners prior to its renaming and the establishment of a U.S. post office in 1862, Walnut Creek continues to be situated at a crossroads where the many elements are brought together which make this city exciting and diverse. While developing into a vibrant, prosperous metropolitan city, Walnut Creek has retained the charm and closeness evident during its early years.

Not wanting to miss an opportunity, Walnut Creek's early public leaders prepared for the city's future economic growth when they advocated for incorporation as a means of attracting investors during the 1915 Panama Pacific International Exposition in San Francisco. As the city's subsequent leaders have continued to highlight the area's inherent assets, Walnut Creek is now considered one of the bay area's most important economic centers.

Balancing this success in the business arena, Walnut Creek is also recognized as one of northern California's leading cultural arts centers. Since the days in 1930 when Clark Gable filmed his movie "The Sporting Blood" at Heather Farm race track, Walnut Creek's contribution to the cultural enrichment of the community has been the focal point of efforts in both the public and private sectors. The highlight of this important contribution will be the completion of its $17.5 million regional center for the arts late in 1990. The city's rich history of providing diverse cultural experiences for its residents earned Walnut Creek the distinction of being chosen as the United States most livable city by the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

Receiving such an honor is indeed fitting during Walnut Creek's diamond jubilee year, and serves as a testament to the pride and love the people of Walnut Creek share for their city. The past 75 years have seen Walnut Creek emerge as one of the bay area's most dynamic communities, and I look forward to being a part of their future successes.

DR. GEORGIA THOMAS-PARKS

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Dr. Georgia Thomas-Parks, who will be the speaker at the NAACP's "Freedom Fund" banquet on October 20. Dr. Parks has made great contributions to the field of social work as an administrator, educator, researcher, and consultant. She has not only done outstanding work in the United States but has also taken her expertise abroad.

Dr. Parks was an assistant professor at the University of Nigeria where she was directly responsible for all aspects of the social work program. She was also hired by the Nigerian Government to develop a social welfare discipline in a British-oriented higher educational program. This project resulted in an autonomous undergraduate social work department.

Dr. Parks also did work with the Rastafarians who live in the Virgin Islands. The project resulted in a better understanding of the Rastafarious people, especially in dealing with their health care practices, religious beliefs, and lifestyle. The study served as the basis for a program developed by the Labor Department that was used to better meet the needs of the Rastafarious people. The study was also used by Job Corp centers throughout the United States, the Virgin Islands, and Puerto Rico.

Dr. Parks was raised in Warren, OH, and is married to Dr. J. Benson Parks. They have three children, ages 20, 18, and 16. Dr. Parks has been a teacher and administrator at some highly respected universities including Howard University, University of Oregon, and Rutgers University. She is presently the area director for the Massachusetts Department of Mental Health.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Dr. Georgia Thomas-Parks for her extraordinary service to her community and country. Dr. Parks is a true humanitarian who has made great strides in the field of social work. Her success stems from her understanding and compassion for other people's problems and we are indebted to Dr. Parks for her dedication to mankind. I am honored to represent this outstanding woman from my 17th Congressional District.

HONORING STEPHEN DiBRIENZA AND ANNETTE SCALA

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join the Independent Neighborhood Democrats in honoring Councilman Stephen DiBrienza and Annette Scala. These two distinguished community activists represent the best Brooklyn has to offer and have continually given their best to their neighborhoods.

To understand the significance of their achievements, it is necessary to reflect on the organization which will honor them on October 27. Born of the antiwar and political and social reform movements which swept Brooklyn and the rest of the Nation two decades ago, IND has remained true to those basic principles from which it was born.

I feel a personal bond to IND and its members because their political roots are very much my own. They have fought the same battles I have, whether for a healthier environment, economic development, safer streets, or a more responsive educational system. Most of all, we have shared a commitment for open and honest democratic institutions from Cadman Plaza to Tiananmen Square.

It is, therefore, with some pride that I join my distinguished colleagues, Assemblywoman Eileen Dugan, State Senator Martin Connor, and district leaders Joan Millman and John McElhinney, in calling IND "home."

IND will honor a very special elected official, Councilman Steve DiBrienza. Steve started out as a young community activist. At first, no one knew who he was or what to make of his youthful exuberance so he was assigned the only job where other more senior members could keep an eye on him: club driver.

Anyone who doubted Steve's abilities and motivation was soon set straight. Steve quickly rose in the esteem of his neighbors. He proved himself equal to every test: fighting to bring transportation bond issue funds to Brooklyn's working waterfront, a successful run for district leader, a leader in the Catholic Youth Organization, and a community organizer.

Steve's greatest test came when he challenged the powerful majority leader of the city council. Steve nearly won this seemingly hopeless battle and in the process taught the rest of us an important lesson. In 1985, when the incumbent retired, there were any number of potential candidates for the open seat. But the voters recognized Steve's years of effort, his vision, and his commitment. In the end, there was no real contest.

Steve DiBrienza represents the true reform tradition. As a member of the city council, he has continued to fight for those causes which brought him into politics many years ago. One need only visit the Third Street or Carroll Street Bridges or read his important report on the state of our waterfront to find examples of Steve's ability to work effectively for our communities.

IND will also honor another remarkable individual. While she holds no elective office, I doubt there is an elected official in south Brooklyn who does not in some way depend on Annette Scala. Her clear vision and boundless energy are continually evident in the life of our borough.

In much the same way, Annette has served IND with a dedication and skill that have kept the club going through good times and bad. She is always ready, with fresh ideas, and with a drive that keeps others involved.

Annette's efforts on behalf of our public school system best illustrate her special brand of community activism. Together with her husband, Philip, Annette fought for reform of the community school board. Their involvement comes from the most basic of concerns: they are the parents of two children in the public school system. They took to heart the purpose of decentralization and fought to make it work for their children. Thanks to Annette and Philip, all children in district 15 will enjoy a brighter future.

As a senior member of Councilman DiBrienza's staff, Annette takes the title public servant to heart. She embodies the ideals of a responsive government and remains among the most effective voices for our community.

By honoring Steve DiBrienza and Annette Scala, IND pays homage to its own roots.

Mr. Speaker, the American system of democracy works best at the grassroots. When concerned citizens mobilize to fight for a more responsive, more honest system of government, then we all benefit. Steve DiBrienza and Annette Scala, in their lives and their work, embody that principle. I am pleased to join the Independent Neighborhood Democrats in honoring them today.

COOPERATIVE EDUCATION WEEK

HON. BUTLER DERRICK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, this week, October 16–20, has been declared Cooperative Education Week in Virginia. The declaration by Gov. Gerald Baliles is of personal interest as this marks the third year of my participation in the Cooperative Education Program in conjunction with Virginia Commonwealth University.

The program with the students has been invaluable. New students come to learn about our Government in a hands-on fashion every semester, and they leave with knowledge that could never be acquired in a classroom environment. In addition, the students and staff in concern create a work environment that is balanced to afford the student an opportunity to sample all the occupational related flavors offered in a congressional office.

This program is important. We would all benefit from the experience of a cooperative education program like the one at Virginia Commonwealth University as well as from other schools throughout the country. The outstanding students participating in this program have been hard working and eager to learn about government in a genuine sense. It has been an extremely worthwhile experience, and one I certainly plan to continue.

BUDGETARY TREATMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY AND OTHER TRUST FUNDS

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. HORTON, Mr. Speaker, when Congress passed Social Security amendments in 1977 and 1983, it made a compact with American workers and employers. In establishing FICA payroll taxes substantially above those needed to pay for current benefits, an agreement was made that American workers and employers would pay more today, to help ensure that their retirement in later years—the retirement of the baby boom generation—would be adequately funded. I can't help but wonder if this compact has become just an illusion.

Last Thursday, in a hearing held by the Subcommittee on Legislation and National Security of the Committee on Government Operations, we heard testimony characterizing as a myth the assumption that the surplus funds being collected today will provide a nest egg to pay for the deficit occasioned by the baby boom's retirement tomorrow. A second witness testified that accumulations in the Social Security trust fund represent only an "accounting fiction".

Despite the current trust fund surplus, economists have stated that Americans in their 30's and 40's will have to accept lower benefits or make their children pay higher taxes to fund benefits equal to those received today.

Thursday's hearing was intended to examine the budegtary treatment of Federal trust funds, including the Social Security trust fund. Yet, in attempting to determine the proper role of these funds in calculating the Federal deficit, it is also necessary to look at whether the funds are being handled in a manner which honors the commitments made to the American people.

Whether it be Social Security, the Highway Trust Fund, the Aviation Trust Fund, or one of the other approximately 160 Federal trust funds, American taxpayers should be able to count on the fact that when they are told that a specific tax will go toward a specific program, the money will indeed be available for that program.

Mr. Speaker, I am leaning strongly toward supporting legislation that goes beyond the off-budget treatment already accorded to Social Security, to fully exclude Social Security trust funds from deficit calculations. In fact, I am inclined to support similar off-budget treatment, when appropriate, for other trust funds.

Deficit reduction remains an imperative. With another budget deadline looming today—a deadline triggering more than $16 billion worth of across-the board program cuts—the need for responsible deficit reduction has never been more obvious.

But deficit reduction should not be achieved by withholding trust fund moneys or enacting accounting gimmickery. We need to reduce the deficit, but we must also stay true to the commitments already made to the American taxpayer.

CHRISTINE HEGEMAN WINS J.C. PENNEY AWARD FOR COMMUNITY SERVICE

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay special recognition to a distinguished citizen of Reading, PA. The person I am speaking of is Christine Hegeman, who recently was recognized as a finalist for the 1989 James Cash Penney Award for Community Service.

Although Christine has a full-time job as a catalog sales supervisor in the thrift drug division of J.C. Penney, she spends anywhere from 100 to 150 hours a month doing volunteer work in her community. She helps the sick and injured through her work with three area ambulance services, the Exeter ambulance, the Lower Alsace ambulance, and the Governor Mifflin ambulance. Christine also teaches CPR as well as first-aid to the public and works to improve her own skills through continuing education in such areas as trauma life support. Moreover, Christine has initiated a support group for individuals with neurofibromatosis.

A recommendation for Christine from one of the agencies she serves is a tribute not just to the many hours of volunteer work she puts in but to the kind of character she exhibits. The recommendation describes Christine as a "friend of the community." It talks of her kindness, assistance, and comforting manner with terrified patients and the dying.

Mr. Speaker, Christine Hegeman is indeed a remarkable woman. She is a most deserving recipient of the recognition that has been bestowed upon her through the James Cash Penney Award and I congratulate her for this special achievement. I also want to thank Christine for giving so generously of herself, her time, and her energy. Christine Hegeman is a shining example of one of our greatest qualities as human beings—the ability to care for others—and she truly represents the best in American voluntarism.

A TRIBUTE TO THE BELLEVILLE-NUTLEY COLUMBUS DAY PARADE

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to recognize the communities of Belleville and Nutley, NJ, and thank them for bringing their communities together once again to celebrate Columbus Day.

The Belleville-Nutley Parade Committee is comprised of members from both communities. Mr. Jaye Tarantino serves as the chairman of the Belleville committee, while the Nutley committee is led by Mr. Bob Rusignuolo. Mr. Gabe Nazziola, the general chairman of the parade, oversees the entire program and works to bring both communities together.

This group of proud Americans has been united by the honor of being asked to march in the sixth annual Columbus Day Parade. This is an event in which all Americans should exist. The annual celebration of the birth of our discoverer is a significant day in the lives of all Americans. This is a tradition which I hope will be able to continue and grow as your parade helps to promote this as a national holiday.

ADDRESS BY THE HONORABLE JOHN LINDSAY

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I have known John Lindsay, former mayor of New York City, for over 20 years. In that time I have always greatly respected his thoughts on the issues of the day, from the concerns of the citizens of Manhattan Borough to our relations with the world. Recently he spoke at the Llangollen International Musical Eisteddfod in North Wales and raised the significance of two vital international issues, global environmental deterioration and global economic injustice.

I want to share his wisdom with the American people and ask that his remarks be reprinted here.

The text of the address follows:

REMARKS OF HON. JOHN V. LINDSAY AT THE LLANGOLLEN INTERNATIONAL MUSICAL EISTEDDFOD, NORTH WALES, GREAT BRITAIN, JULY 6, 1989

Friends, all. My wife Mary and I have been to hundreds of festivals in many parts of the world. This may well be the best we have ever seen. It is simply magnificent.

I wish to thank Lord Emlyn Hoosen, the distinguished Welshman and Queens counselor for inviting us here. It is also he whom we must all thank for his many efforts to make this the great festival that indeed it is.

As I stand here today, I wish I spoke the Welsh language. It is one of the oldest in all of Europe. It is also one of the most beautiful and musical. It is an APT vehicle for the people of Wales to express their wisdom and sensitivity.

This festival was first held in 1947 to bring the peoples of the world together after the ravages of World War II.

I remember those war years well. How lucky I was. My life was saved on the battlefield by British gunners during the invasion of Sicily and by Australian Scouts in Southeast Asia. After serving in the Navy during World War II, I returned to the United States to capture my law degree at Yale University. Following graduation in 1948, I traveled back to Great Britian to visit the parents of a young friend of mine, a comrade-at-arms in the R.A.F. who was killed in aerial combat. He was their only son. As a memento they gave me his school cufflinks and I've treasured them. They've reminded me of both my friendship with a fallen British airman and the special relationship that will always exist between his nation and my own.

This festival exemplifies the legacy of peace and harmony that the Welsh have given to the world.

As an American, I particularly appreciate the special contribution Wales has made to both my nation and to history.

Just think of three great Americans of Welsh descent:

Thomas Jefferson—A Founding Father and President of the United States, ardent protector of basic human freedoms and civil rights, architect, inventor, musician, botanists, and a most modern, civilized man.

D. W. Griffith—The father of the American film industry. His pioneering work laid the foundation for the film and broadcast media which have done so much to promote world understanding.

Frank Lloyd Wright—The great architect who accomplished so much in helping man understand his relationship with his environment. He summed up his vision of architecture's purpose when he said: "No house should ever be on any hill or on anything. It should be of the hill, belonging to it so hill and house could live together, each the happier for the other."

Jefferson, Griffith, Wright, great men of great vision. Great men who helped build our society and shape its future. All were of Welsh ancestry. Their achievements, however, made them men of the world in the truest sense.

Fresh vision and courage are urgently needed today as we approach another crossroads in history—one fraught with both peril and promise.

The end of the cold war may well be in sight. We might be witnessing the closing chapter in this tragic saga and a halt to the waste of billions of dollars on armaments. These resources should be spent instead on alleviating human misery. With the cold war no longer dominating our leaders' thinking, what new vision of the world will shape their agenda?

Words and phrases like "glasnost" and "perestroika", and "negotiate, but verify" are generalities, not vision. We need more. We must demand greater thoughtfulness and bravery from our leadership, and from ourselves. True democracy means we the poeple, all of us, must show that we are willing to accept new realities and deal with them accordingly.

Two new wars, as perilous as the old, cold war are now being waged on two new fronts. They are:

The war against environmental suicide and the war against economic injustice.

These converging perils are in many ways as dangerous as the one posed by the Axis threat of the late 1930's and early 1940's. They are especially troubling because as a famous American comic strip character once said: "We have met the enemy and they is us."

Each of us is guilty of a dozen daily offenses against our environment. Every mile we drive, every time we discard a newspaper or the material containing our food and drink, we contribute to the world's pollution.

Similarly, each of us is caught up in some way in a global economic system that is driving the have's and have not's further and further apart throughout the world.

To win these wars, we must not only rise above our immediate personal needs or parochial interests. We must also summon the best men and women in our society to lead us in the battles against environmental degradation and economic injustice.

I call on Frank Lloyd Wright's successors to present a vision of how we may live in greater harmony with our physical environment. To help us balance our need for progress and growth with our need to return to our world that which we take from it.

I call on Thomas Jefferson's successors to present a vision of how to transform an arms race into a campaign for economic justice. To help us avoid economic nationalism or regionalism and promote a system where equal opportunity to produce and market can help narrow the wide gulf between rich and poor nations that now exists.

And, lastly, I call on D.W. Griffith's successors to continue to provide vivid views of our common humanity that can help us move beyond the cold war and address these new perils with greater international cooperation.

These hopes notwithstanding, we can't forget the startling images recently transmitted instantly around the world from Tiananmen Square. In Beijing the cries for economic justice and freedom were suppressed by the faceless totalitarianism that characterized the cold war. The aftermath of that struggle will continue to occupy us for a while.

Ladies and gentlemen, the future is ours if we can find the vision to recognize its promises and the will to realize its potential. For clarity, we are fortunate to have the guiding legacy of many great Welshmen.

It is their sons and daughters that I thank for the opportunity to speak today.

Thank you all, let the music continue.

HONORING DOMINICK MASULLO

HON. ELIOT L. ENGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, on October 19, 1989, the Columbia Association of the New York City Housing Authority Police Department will be honoring one of my constituents, retired police officer Dominick Masullo.

Dom Masullo served as a member of the housing authority's police force from 1979 until 1984 when an injury in the line of duty forced his early retirement. During his time on the force he served on the anticrime team and as an aide to the commanding officer of support services.

Even after leaving the force, Dom still is keeping his commitment to protecting the people, in this case, one of the most vulnerable segments of society, our children.

In November 1984 Dom Masullo and a small number of other dedicated individuals started an organization called Children Are Precious. Children Are Precious deals with the serious problem of abused and abducted children. Though less than 5 years old, this organization has now established itself across Bronx County and will hopefully go citywide within the next year. Among other services it provides, sensitivity training to the New York City Board of Education, the Archdiocese of New York, and the New York Police Department. It also works with children and parents by providing safety seminars.

In December 1988 the offices of Children Are Precious were severely damaged by fire. By June 1989, thanks to the hard work of Dom, his staff, elected officials, and the community at large, Children Are Precious had new headquarters.

Dom Masullo is a shining example of what dedication and concern are all about. I am proud to join those who are honoring him.

TRIBUTE TO GLEN MILLS SCHOOL

HON. CURT WELDON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I rise today to pay tribute to the Glen Mills School which will celebrate its centennial on October 20, 1989.

The Glen Mills School provides educational and vocational opportunities for young men with special needs in a style unlike any other school of its kind. Located in beautiful Thornbury Township, Delaware County, PA, the Glen Mills School educates its students in a country setting which few comparable schools can offer.

The curriculum includes a variety of levels from a learning center that teaches basic skills to college preparatory courses. Every student that attends Glen Mills participates in an academic program suited to his specific needs. The end result is an educational experience which better prepares him for reentry into society.

The vocational curriculum includes many hands-on opportunities ranging from an optical lab to an FM radio station. Vocational skills learned in the classrooms and the fully equipped shops, provide the students with training and practical experience.

Mr. Speaker and fellow colleagues, Glen Mills School operates on the basic premise that all students have an unlimited potential to learn and develop. We in Pennsylvania are very proud of the school's outstanding educational record. Please join me in congratulating the Glen Mills School for its 100 years of achievement.

IN RECOGNITION OF MR. MORRIS CASUTO

HON. BILL LOWERY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, it affords me great pleasure in calling your attention to Mr. Morris Casuto, an outstanding community leader in the 41st Congressional District of California.

Mr. Casuto presently serves as the director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith. As such, he has created many successful programs that assist in fostering the awareness and respect for different ethnic and religious backgrounds. By developing and implementing the Evangelical and Catholic-Jewish dialog groups he has contributed significantly to improving communication among San Diego's religious leaders. Recently, he initiated an innovative police training program that focuses on the dangers of racial extremism and bigotry while teaching officers to be sensitive to the public.

Mr. Casuto has not only devoted his career to public service, but much of his free time. Over the years he has been involved with the Integration Task Force, the Mexican-American Foundation, and the San Diego Pops. He presently serves as a member of the advisory board of the San Diego Law Center and on the advisory committee for the San Diego Cancer Society.

Mr. Speaker, please join me in saluting Mr. Morris Casuto for his determination to reduce prejudice and discrimination in San Diego. His efforts have been significant and are sincerely appreciated.

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL FOR THE PRIVATE RELIEF OF MILTON BRUNO FACCHINI

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill for the private relief of Milton Bruno Facchini. Milton Facchini was born deaf on June 19, 1965, in Sao Paulo, Brazil. In 1983, Milton's sister, Ivone, who is also deaf, met and married Mr. Anthony Caloroso of Hayward, CA, and subsequently moved to the United States. Mr. Caloroso is a deaf computer operator at Wells Fargo Bank in Concord, CA. In 1983, Milton's father passed away and earlier this year, his mother passed away.

Milton has only one relative left in Brazil with whom he can communicate, a 70-year-old uncle. He has graduated from the eighth grade, worked in an office and now works in a bank. His sister, Ivone Caloroso, has taken the vocational rehabilitation tests. She just started training courses in the English language in order to qualify for a job. She is also studying the Constitution so that she can become a U.S. citizen. Milton plans to do the same thing if he is admitted to the United States. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that granting Milton U.S. citizenship and allowing him to live with his family is the compassionate thing to do.

CONGRATULATIONS TO ELIZABETH CLEMONS

HON. JERRY F. COSTELLO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, it is not often enough that we offer congratulations on the floor of this House to those who set high standards in the field of education. Today I would like to recognize a constituent of mine who has truly excelled in this field and has been an example to other educators of commitment and dedication to teaching.

Elizabeth Clemons, who teaches fourth grade at St. Augustine of Canterbury School in Belleville, IL, is among eight teachers and four principals who have recently been awarded Distinguished Educator Awards in Illinois.

The awards, cosponsored by the Illinois State Board of Education and the Milken Foundation, are given to those applicants demonstrating the finest aspects and talents involved in teaching. Elizabeth was among 500 teachers and principals nominated for the award.

As we continue to debate the importance of education and our role in increasing funding for educational programs, we should also be aware that our Nation's teachers are the most important link in that process. I want to again congratulate Elizabeth Clemons on this fine achievement.

ALBERT GRADY

HON. EDOLPHUS TOWNS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, today, I rise to pay homage to one of life's unsung heroes, Mr. Albert Grady of Brooklyn, NY.

The greatness of a nation depends upon the individual contributions of its citizens. It is in the sacrifice of commitment and concern of these ordinary people that we grow and prosper as a society. Mr. Albert Grady's story is unlikely to appear on the evening news, but his contributions have enriched the lives of others in important ways.

Albert Grady was born in a small town in Georgia in 1909. He moved to New York City at the age of 18. As a young man alone in a great city he struggled to support himself by holding various jobs. He understood the value of education and training and sought a means to obtain a career instead of merely a job. After completing difficult coursework, he became an electrician. He worked as an electrician in the public and private sectors. He was an electrician with the Kings County Hospital from 1951 until his retirement in 1974.

Retirement has not slowed down Mr. Grady. Since 1974, he and his wife have traveled extensively to such farflung destinations as Asia, Europe and the Carribean.

In addition to traveling, Mr. Grady has devoted much time to his family. In 1987, he was recognized as Father of the Year by Cornerstone Baptist Church.

However the essence of Mr. Grady's achievements have been in his service to the community. He has maintained his active involvement in the community. He is an active member of the NAACP; the financial secretary of the Bedford Stuyvesant Senior Citizens Council; treasurer of the HI-12 club; member of the Long Island Consistory; a Shriner with the Abu Bekr Temple No. 19 and a loyal and active Royal Arch Mason of the African 459 Lodge.

In essence, Mr. Albert Grady exemplifies the meaning of service and dedication. We would all do well to emulate his example.

TRIBUTE TO PHASE: PIGGY BACK, INC., CELEBRATES 20 YEARS OF EXCELLENT AND DEDICATED SERVICE TO COMMUNITY

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise before you and my colleagues today to bestow upon you the wonderful virtues of an organization that on October 20 will be celebrating 20 years of providing invaluable and dedicated service to the Harlem community. This organization of which I speak is Phase: Piggy Back, Inc.

Founded in 1968 out of the hearts and minds of four men from Harlem, Phase: Piggy Back was formed out of its parent company, Operation Helping Hand, Inc., a nonprofit, drug-free corporation.

The goal of these men was to give to the community that they cared for so much. They held a genuine concern for Harlem and wanted to do something about the problems and ills of drug addiction that plagued the neighborhoods. They put their plan into action by organizing "block jamborees" in order to help bring the residents of Harlem together to meet and exchange ideas, and also to gain and share new perspectives.

Since 1970, Phase: Piggy Back has been providing a drug free education and prevention program. Offering such services as drug prevention, family and individual counseling, therapy groups, and remedial academics, they also provide help with financial, housing, legal, and veteran assistance.

The dedication and determination of these four men—Andrew Henderson, Arthur Mitchell, Jose Ferrer, and Abukarriem Shabazz—made Phase: Piggy Back the fine organization that it is today. It is an organization that is totally sensitive to the needs of the addict. Using a drug-free approach as a means of further establishing the importance of independence as it relates to substance abuse, they know that it is important to raise people's cultural and social awareness. They do this through invaluable service and training.

Phase: Piggy Back highly stresses the concept of total community involvement. People being their main concern, they are strongly about saving lives and the community so that there will be something here for future generations.

Being the chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, I am always happy to learn of fine organizations such as this one, that are doing something to help fight the problem of substance abuse. I am sure I share the sentiments of the residents of Harlem when I say, we are fortunate to have this organization in our midst making such a great contribution to the community. They are a true mark of excellence.

A TRIBUTE TO THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ARMY NATIONAL GUARD BAND

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, October 16, 1989

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to call to the attention of my fellow Members the history and mission of the 257th Army Band of the District of Columbia Army National Guard. Covering a span of 65 years serving the Nation's Capital, this band is comprised of 53 active members, with 5 of their members having more than 20 years of service in the band.

The 257th Army Band is the District of Columbia National Guard's band. The band's mission is "to provide music in support of official military ceremonies, formations, and activities. To include Army Recruiting and community relations." Known as the "Band of the Capital Guardians," the band has, in its 65 years, traveled from the Virgin Islands to Canada. In times of war, the band has been stationed in locations from Alaska to the British West Indies.

The 257th Army Band supports both military and community activities in the Washington, DC, metropolitan area. In addition to the Concert and Marching Bands, the 257th has many diverse ensembles to suit any event or need:

Stage Band, led by S. Sgt. Leroy Barton, Jr., jazz and big band style music.

Stone Bisquit, led by Sgt. Gregory G. Deutsch, rock and roll.

Encore Ensemble, led by Sfc. Diana K. Page, providing background music for social military functions.

The Unchained Ensemble, led by Sfc. John R. Jenkins, performing light improvisational jazz for all occasions.

Saxophone quartet, also led by S. Sgt. Leroy Barton, Jr., arrangements for four saxophones.

Bass Quintet, let by S. Sgt. Walter H. Appel, music arranged for two trumpets, French horn, trombone, and tuba.

Woodwind Quintet, led by Sfc. Larry J. Alverson, music arranged for flute, clarinet, oboe, French horn, and bassoon.

Bass Choir, led by Sfc. David R. Rorick, music arranged for brass ensemble without woodwind or percussion accompaniment.

Barbershop Quartet, led by Sgt. Roger A. Nale, four voices, two tenors, baritone and bass, combining in perfect harmony.

Historically the band is the consolidation of three bands: (1) Band Section of the 121st Engineers, organized February 5, 1924; (2) Band Section, Service Battery of the 260th Coastal Artillery, organized January 12, 1939; and (3) 91st Army Band, organized November 23, 1953.

All of these bands served primarily as units of the District of Columbia National Guard. The band(s) inducted into Federal service from (1) February 3, 1941 to May 31, 1943 and (2) January 6, 1941 to May 25, 1946. On December 10, 1943, the 260th was redesignated as the 257th Army Band. Consolidation of the first two bands was on March 3, 1947, and they were designated as the 257th Army Ground Forces Band. The third band was consolidated with them on March 1, 1959, finally designated as the 257th Army Band.

Like any other National Guard unit, the band performs 48 drill periods (4 hours each) and 15 days of active duty annual training a year. Unlike other units, who perform a one weekend a month drill, the band drills on most Monday nights throughout the year. This enables us to maintain our level of proficiency on our individual instruments as well as our ability to perform as an ensemble. The band is only as good as the musicians that comprise it. It's for this reason that we are very thankful for the dedicated and professional citizen-soldier musicians that make up the 257th.
